Archbishop says a loving slap can be good for children

Carey: extends support

BY RUTH GLEDHILL RELIGION CORRESPONDENT

THE ARCHBISHOP of Canterbury. Dr George Carey, said yester-day that children should sometimes be slapped to lay down moral foundations for life.

In comments which reopened the debate on corporal punishment and sparked immediate criticism, Dr Carey, who has four children and five grandchildren, said that there was nothing wrong with gently slapping a child that transgressed, as long as it was done with love.

His remarks come five months after Tony Blair, the Labour leader.

suying: "Children must realise there wanting a future generation of very confused and very concerned. are some things they can't do."

Dr Carey, interviewed by Kate Adie on BBC Radio 2 for its World of Faith week, said that morality started in the family. "It starts when people bring up children with firm boundaries. You say, 'don't do this', you mustn't do that' and you gendy slap them if they do transgress and there is nothing wrong with that as long as it is done with love and with firm discipline within the family set-

Dr Carey added: "We older people must practise what we preach. So I don't think we pontificate from on high. We actually live the kind of discipline we are young people to grow up with." He said the kind of guidelines he meant were to be found in the Bible. For example, I want to go back to the firm teaching of the Ten Commandments. It has statements about living together, faithfulness, about honesty, about loving God." Dr Carey, whose daughters Rachel and Lizzie have five sons between them, reiterated his support for moral crusade launched by Frances Lawrence, widow of the murdered London headmaster,

Philip Lawrence. The archbishop said: "I think we must eatch the moment. This is obviously a time when people are They see young people growing up without a sense of moral direction and therefore we, the older generation, must help them."

Last night Dr Carey was defended by his son, Andrew Carey, editor of The Church of England Newspaper, who said: 'I support what he has said. I grew up in a background where there was gentle discipline which gave us all an idea of right and wrong."

Mr Carey, who was divorced and is remarried but has no children, said: "It does not mean we are perfect, but we do have a sense of right and wrong as a result of that

The store refused to give details of services the bank would provide but said it would offer competitive rates of interest. At present most high street banks pay 3 per cent interest on an instant access account.

Sainsbury says it will be able to offer competitive rates because telephone banking has a very low cost base. It aims to attract bank customers through intensive marketing at its 365 stores around the

New Labour, new irritant

By JAMES LANDALE POLITICAL REPORTER

THE mobile phone, that vital tool of the modern workplace and irritant to thousands, has finally breached the last bastion of low-tech tranquillity: the House of Commons.

Tessa Jowell, Labour MP for Dulwich and frontbench spokeswoman on health, yesterday broke the unwritten rule that MPs must turn off their mobiles and bleeps before they enter the Chamber. With a resounding melodic chime of "da, da, daa" that stunned MPs, her phone rang out during the debate on

THE Prince of Wales yesterday went on the offensive against youth unemployment, asking business to support an expansion of his charity which offers the jobless voluntary

He attacked what he called the "terrible waste" of 600,000 unemployed people under the age of 25 and asked for support for his millennium crusade" which aims to recruit 25,000 young people a year, two-thirds of them unemployed, to his Volunteers

St James's Palace said that the Prince had been pursuing broadly similar objectives to those of Frances Lawrence, widow of the dead headmaster, for nearly 20 years, ever since his Prince's Trust charity was first established.

"The whole thrust of the Prince's efforts has been to help young people to succeed. to prevent them feeling alienated, and to make them recognise that they belong to society and have a role in it," one of his senior officials said.

The Volunteers scheme, launched six years ago and widely known as "Charlie's Angels", has so far put 12,000 young people through short courses to teach them communication and citizenship and to involve them in community projects. The expansion of the scheme has the backing of John Major, Tony Blair and Paddy Ashdown.

The Prince, addressing a conference of the Institute of Personnel and Development in Harrogate, said: "When I first started out on this particular venture I was motivated by the fact that we were the only country in Europe which did not provide our young people with the opportunity to contribute something to their country at one point in their lives. Howard to spend £3bn on new jails

By RICHARD FORD

TWELVE new prisons costing 13 billion to build and run will be needed to cope with the prisoners to be jailed as a result of radical sentencing proposals announced by the Government yesterday.

The proposals met a bar-rage of criticism from penal reform groups and set Michael Howard, the Home Secretary, on a collision course with the judiciary.

The most radical sentencing proposals this century will introduce American-style minimum terms for persistent burglars and dealers in hard drugs, and automatic life terms for repeat violent and sexual offenders. The Bill also provides for greater supervison of sex offenders and will end the Home Secretary's power to veto the release of offenders, such as the boys jailed for killing James Bulger. Mr Howard's plans would add 11,000 inmates to the prison population, expected to be 62,000 by spring. He said his Bill was the biggest step in the fight against crime.

Lord Donaldson, a former Master of the Rolls, said: This will produce injustice, gross injustice in particular cases. It may be that the second offence, or indeed both offences, were committed under gross provocation, per-haps in a domestic context, [yet] they shall be sentenced to life imprisonment".

Germans to ban import of sheep tissue from Britain

GERMANY announced yesterday that it is to ban the import and use of brains, spinal cord and eyes from French and British sheep over 12 months old as a safeguard against "mad cow" disease.

The precaution has been prompted by the possibility that the cattle brain disease. bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE), might have spread to sheep and could pose a risk to humans,

Gaelic TV station prepares for the £31m switch-on

By AUDREY MAGEE, IRELAND CORRESPONDENT

IRELAND'S first Gaelic television channel goes on air next Thursday in defiance of complaints that the £31 million project to promote the Irish language is a waste of taxpayers' money.

Irish people from amund the world have rallied to the new station's assistance. The Hollywood actor Gabriel Byrne, whose films include the Usual Suspects, is playing a leading role in an hour-long drama set in the 1960s. Opponents claim the station will be an expensive white elephant catering for a minority. Teilifis na Gaeilge will broadcast in Irish for more than four hours a day from a new headquarters in the west of Ireland, for 140,000 native Irish speakers who have been campaigning for their own station for 20 years. The Galway-based station will show a mixture of Irishmade news, drama, culture, soaps, quizzes and comedy. The emphasis will be on youth and making the Irish language accessible to schoolchildren learning the language. English subtitles will be available on teletext.

Jacqueline Ni Fhearghusa, an executive of Bord na Gaeilge, the Irish language board, said it would be a great boost to the Irish language movement which had witnessed a dramatic growth in the past ten years. Michael D. Higgins, the Minister for Arts, Culture and the Gaeltacht, said the station would "enfranchise the Irishspeaking community". The language suffered a decline in the mid-1800s when famine struck and economic necessity forced the Irish to speak English. By 1861, only 24.5 per cent of the population spoke Irish. By 1911 this had fallen to 17.6 per cent. But Irish is now back in vogue in an affluent and confident Ireland. Almost one third of the 3.5 million population claims to speak the lan-

The rest are from urban areas such as Dublin where Irish language night-classes are booked up and young people are flooding to Irish dances. The number of Irish language schools for children has risen dramatically in 20 years.

Paddy Harte, an MP for Fine Gael, one of the three cualition parties in government, said Teilifis na Gaeilge smacked of political favouritism and the £15 million annual subsidy would be better invested in Irish schools: "It is the most expensive white elephant ever constructed by an Irish Government.

Drug raid nets Briton with £40m fortune

By RICHARD DUCE

DETECTIVES in Liverpool have helped Dutch police to arrest a millionaire businessman suspected of a plan to flood the streets of northwest England with drugs worth £100 million.

Among nine Britons being held in The Netherlands yes-terday was Curtis Warren, 32, who has long been under surveillance by Merseyside police. If convicted, he would be one of the biggest players in the region's drug-smuggling

Mr Warren, whose personal fortune is estimated as high as £40 million. was arrested with a Colombian and a Russian woman in a series of raids across The Netherlands. He is now a Dutch resident in Amsterdam and it is unlikely that any hearing against him will take place in Britain. Police said last night there were no extradition plans. Mr Warren was suspected five years ago of involvement in a plot to smuggle £150 million of cocaine into Liverpool from South America. He was aquitted of drugs charges at Newcastle Crown Court.

Mr Warren, married with a child, owns property in the revived Liverpool docks area and a house in Wirral. He is also believed to have property in Spain. Officers of the North West Regional Crime Squad were said to be "cock-a-hoop" at the arrests.

Wife who fears death by stoning wins asylum plea

By A STAFF REPORTER

A BATTERED wife from Pakistan who fears stoning to death if forced to return home won a High Court decision vesterday that could pave the way for more women in her position to claim asylum.

A judge ruled that wives rejected by their husbands for alleged adultery in such circumstances were "a social group" entitled to protection inthis country under the 1951 UN refugees convention.

An immigration lawyer said later the judge's decision had widened the previous narrow legal definition of a social group and would have impor-tant significance for other asylum seekers.

Acknowledging that his decision could add to the number of asylum seekers coming to Britain, Mr Justice Sedley said the asylum system was already "groaning under other burdens"

That called for "scrupulous attention" being given to every claim, but it could not "redefine the meaning of the con-vention", he said. The judge was allowing an application by Mrs Syeda Shah, of Canning Town, east London, for her asylum case to be considered by the Immigration Appeal Tribunal.

The tribunal itself refused the request in August last year after a special adjudicator ruled that, although she had already been persecuted by her husband and there was "a reasonable expectation" she would be persecuted again, she was not part of a social group entitled to asylum under the convention.

The adjudicator was brought in after the Home Secretary initially refused her claim for asylum. Quashing the appeal tribunal's decision and ordering it to hear Mrs Shah's case, Mr Justice Sedley described how Mrs Shah, who had been brought up partly in Britain, returned to her homeland as a 17-year-old to marry.

After having six children, she was driven out of her home "after years of violence". Arriving back in Britain she found she was pregnant.

The judge said Mrs Shah
"credibly feared" that if she returned to her husband she would be accused of conceiving the child adulterously and could be exposed to trial under the sharia laws, which pre-scribed storing to death for adultery.
The judge said the Secretary of State's decision letter gave as a reason for refusing her asylum application, "without a trace of irony", the fact that "since 1988 no individual has been punished by the authorities by use of the death penalty for adultery". The judge warned Mrs Shah that her appeal was not bound to succeed, but she was to be judged by a test which

Briton discovers supernova after listening to Oasis

BY ANIANA AHWA

WHEN Mark Armstrong first noticed a speck in the sky through his telescope, he thought it might be an asteroid. He contacted a fellow amateur astronomer who passed the word to another in Australia. Yesterday he was being feted as the first British astronomer, professional or amateur, to discover a

Mr Armstrong, 38, an unemployed civil servant from Rolvenden, Kent, spotted the exploding star at 3.17am (BST) on Thursday. Another glance an hour later showed the bright speck wasn not moving, ruling out the possi-bility that it was an asteroid.

By 4.45am. Mr Armstrong was on the telephone to Guy Hurst, a bank manager from Reading who is used to being woken up in his capacity as head of the UK Nova! Supernova Patrol. Mr Hurst sent out an alert to an informal network of likeminded amateurs around the world. Within nine hours of Mr Armstrong's first sighting, an astronomer in Australia had confirmed something intriguing was indeed afoot. final proof came from the European Southern Observatory in Chile, which provided irrefutable evidence that the star was exploding. The International Astronomical Union, the governing body which monitors and approves such discoveries, gave its blessing to Supernova 1996bo on Thursday night. Mr Armstrong, who shares the glory with a group of professional astronomers at professional astronomers at the Beijing Observatory, said yesterday: "Only a few days ago I had the radio on, and Champagne Supernova by Oasis came on I was convinced I was going to spot something." He said he normally listened to Led Zeppelin during his long watches. Mr Armstrong and his wife Claire, a tax inspector and astronomy enthusiast, spend almost every clear night observing the sky, sometimes until 5am. They have built a wooden observatory with a sliding roof which houses a loin, remote controlled telescope. The telescope, with attached camera, is rigged up to a computer. They are relative newconsers to the hunt for supernovae, and have only been looking since June 1995. Since then they have cramined 500 galaxies during a total of 290 hours. Supernova 1996bo lies in the far-off galaxy NGC 673. It is the brightest of the 67

supernovae discovered this year, and is expected to brighten over the following week before waning again. Brian Marsden, director of the Central Bureau of Astronomical Telegrams, ranked Mr Armstrong's discovery as the most important supernova this year.

"This is a real coup for Mr Armstrong and for British astronomers," Mr Marsden said yesterday. "I am pretty certain he is the first British astronomer, professional or amateur, to spot a supernova, and you can't get a more dramatic discovery than that. Usually the discoveries are made by the Australians.

Drug tests on babies halted after blunder over dosage levels

By NIGEL HAWKES, SCIENCE EDITOR

TRIALS of a drug designed to save babies from brain damage have been halted after they were given double the intended dose.

Fourteen babies died but NHS experts say that the overdose was not responsible for the deaths, which would have happened anyway. Nevertheless, Professor Malcolm Levine, of Leeds University, the project co-ordinator, stopped the trial last month when the error came to light. By then, 53 babies had taken part in the international tests and half had been given the drug, magnesium sulphate.

The study was set up last December and involved doctors in Europe, South Africa and Hong Kong. Twenty-five hospitals in eight countries were involved, including 15 in Britain. The aim was to assess the possible benefits of magnesium sulphate in reducing brain damage in babies starved of oxygen during birth. The condition affects one in 1,000 babies and can have serious consequences. Even those that survive may suffer brain damage with long-term effects.

The aim of the trial, financed by the Medical Research Council and the NHS Executive, was to recruit 75 babies, giving half the drug, the other half a placebo, and comparing the results.

On August Z3 a baby given magnesium sulphate in a Finnish hospital suffered breathing and heart complications. The same happened in Sweden on September 24 and the trial was stopped the next day. Both babies were resuscitated but one died.

Analysis showed that 14 of the 53 babies who took part died. The NHS Data Monitoring Committee investigated whether the deaths were a result of the blunder but cleared doctors of responsi-

home has been targeted every night because I refuse to give £20 protection money to a gang of teenagers. I've had lumps of concrete and bricks thrown through my windows and now I put metal grilles over them."

Martin Ellis, deputy branch manager at Edward Mellors, a local estate agent, said: "Mr Embury and his wife came to us for a valuation but although he bought the property for £26,000 nine years ago he'd be lucky to get about £5,000 now. When residents call me for a valuation I can virtually quote a price over the phone. The area is in a terrible state. We sold one house for £3,800. It had squatters in it and all the floorboards were up.

"The only people who buy property like that, buy for each then let it out to people on benefit. It becomes a vicious cycle of reposessions, empty homes and squatters."

Manchester City Council said that it had set up a working party to examine the problems in the Redvers Street area and elswhere in the hope of reversing the decline.

A WARTIME gunner who was killed more than 50 years ago when his Lancaster bomber crashed was buried

Sergeant Robert Banks died after the bomber collided with another Lancaster soon after midnight on March 2, 1945, during a training flight over Lincolnshire. He was listed as missing, presumed killed.

The remains of Sergeant Banks, who came from Kensington, west London, and discovered last year when archaeologists found the wreckage of the Lancaster near Sleaford while excavating the wreck of another Lancaster. He was buried with full military honours at a ceremony in Cambridge city cemetery. Members of 207 Squadron, who were based with Sergeant Banks at RAF Spilsby, were at the funeral. Only six of the eight-man crew of his Lancaster were officially identified at the time of the crash. Another body remained unidentified and was buried in Cambridge as an unknown airman. However, the discovery of Sergeant Banks's remains enabled the other body to be identified as the Lancaster's bomber, Flight Sergeant Arthur Henderson.

His sister, Jennie Studholme, 68, attended a separate ceremony held at the same RAF burial plot in Cambridge, at which a headstone was dedicated to Flight Sergeant

An RAF spokesman said: When the body of an airman is recovered it is irrelevant whether the death occurred yesterday or 50 years ago; the remains are treated with equal

Mary Bruce: the most inexperienced pilot ever to circumnavigate the globe

Never mind the frock, how much is that plane?

IT WAS one of those impulse buys that can happen while shopping in Bond Street. The Honourable Mary Bruce was in town looking for a nice new frock, when instead she noticed a showroom with a light aircraft for sale at a terribly reasonable price.

Mrs Bruce, then 35, went away to try on a dress. It did not suit her. The plane did. That moment in 1930 was the beginning of an adventure for an intrepid English eccentric who became the most inexperienced pilot ever to circumnavigate the globe, After qualifying for her Class A pilot's licence in the minimum 40 hours' flying - all within three miles of her local serodrome - she took off the me year on a 16,500-mile flight around the world in her £550 Blackburn Bluebird, crossing 23 countries on three

Now memorabilia from her flight are being put up for auction by her family. The items include a 78rpm record of Mrs Bruce recounting in cut-glass tones her experiences facing death in her tiny pleasure craft. One of her few complaints was that she attracted such interest whenever she made an arranged stopover that crash-landings were the only way to find the time to have a haircut.

Mrs Bruce, from Bradfordon-Avon, Wiltshire, was no stranger to adventure. Paul Viney, managing director of the auctioneers Woolley and Wallis, said: "She was a complete eccentric. She loved anything with an element of ber pony bolted when she was a child.

"She was one of the first women to buy a motorcycle, and was always being hauled up in court for speeding down country lanes with her dog in the sidecar. She took to driving cars when she married the racing driver Victor Bruce in 1926. As a couple they once drove as far as they could into the Arctic Circle before they ran out of road."

In 1927, spurred on by her husband, Mrs Bruce won the Coupe des Dames in the Monte Carlo rally. Two years later, she set a non-stop record by covering 674 nautical miles in a powerboat. Then came the moment she spotted the plane on sale in Bond Street.

She later recalled: "I asked the price, then I left the shop. A little down the street I saw a marvellous frock in another bit, so I went back to the aeroplane showroom. "I asked the man, Will this take me round the world? He said, 'Of course, madam.' So ! went home and looked at the map." Within a week, she was flying solo. The scratchy recording of Mrs Bruce reading entries from the flight log includes this memory: "Sam. Another sight of land now. 8.15: Oil failing rapidly. Great doubts whether she will hold out long enough to reach the land. This may be my end as the oil pressure is down to nought. "8.30: See land in the distance. I fear the engine will fail before I reach it 8.45: Have reached the coast and am about to make forced landing in the sand."

After one mishap near Portland, Oregon, she wrote: "The only chance I have to get my death at every town I arrive at. and I am so tired sometimes I can bardly fly."

In 1933 she successfully completed one of the world's first mid-air refuelling manoeuvres. Back on land and in need of a new challenge in 1939, she triumphed in a showjumping event in the Royal Windsor Horse Show.

Even old age did not slow her down. She found time to write five books, including an autobiography entitled Nine Lives Plus, and at the age of 78 she was driving around Thruxton motor-racing circuit, near Andover. Hampshire, at 110mph. She died, aged 94, in 1990.

The sale memorabilia includes five folders of press cuttings, her pilot's licence, log books and a model she built of her plane. The single lot is hoped to fetch £5,000 to

Howard sets out tough new sentencing regime *

Crime Bill: Persistent offenders face longer punishment

By Richard Ford, home correspondent

THE biggest changes in sentencing policy this century part of the Government's fourth substantial reorganisation of the criminal justice system in eight years. The main feature of introducing minimum sentences for persistent burglars and dealers in hard drugs is a Uturn from the Government's position in 1990, when it gave warning that such penalties could lead to more acquittals by juries.

Michael Howard, the Home Secretary, said that the measures were needed because the public had a right to more protection from serious and violent criminals and persistent offenders. The 62-page Crime (Sentences) Bill, which the Government wants to pass through Parliament by the end of February, proposes a the following:

☐ Serious violent and sex offenders: Automatic life sentences will be imposed on offenders convicted for a second time of attempted murder, threat or conspiracy to mur-der, manslaughter, wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, robbery involv-endanger life, rape, attempted rape, or unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 13.

A trial judge will set the minimum term to be served for retribution and deterrence". When that is completed the Parole Board will decide whether and when a person should be released. The judiciary, however, will retain the discretion not to impose an automatic life sentence in "exceptional circumstances". The judge will have to explain such circumstances in open court and the Attorney-General will be able to argue for a life term through the Court of Appeal. ☐ Mandatory minimum sen-tences for persistent dealers in Class A drugs: Courts will have to impose a seven-year minimum term on an offender aged 18 or over who is convicted of trafficking in a Class A drug, such as heroin, cocaine or Ecstasy, after two separate similar convictions. A trial judge will have the power to jail term on an offender aged 18 or over who is convicted of a domestic burglary after two separate similar convictions. The mandatory sentence will apply to any previous convictions for similar offences committed after the Bill becomes law. A trial judge will have the power to impose a lesser sentence if there are "exceptional circumstances". A guilty plea could attract a maximum six-month cut in the mandatory minimum sentence.

ers on release: All sex offenders will be subject to extended supervision by probation officers after their release. The period of supervision is to be half of the sentence or 12

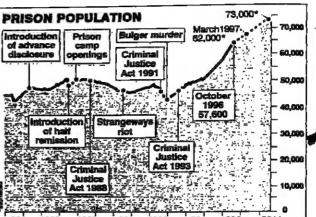

In certain circumstance supervision could be extended to a maximum of ten years. ☐ Mentally disordered offenders: A new hospital direction will allow the court to pass a prison sentence and attach a direction of immediate admission to hospital. This allows for offenders who recover during treatment to serve the rest of the sentence in prison rather than be released

☐ Fine Defaulters and Persistent Petty Offenders: Courts will have a new power to impose community service or a curlew linked to electronic tagging as an atlemative to a fine for an offender with one or more outstanding fines. Similar penalties would also apply to fine defautlers.

☐ Parole: The Home Secretary will no longer have the power to reject a Parole Board recommendation that a person detained "at Her Majesty's Pleasure" should be

☐ Abolition of early release and parole: All offenders to serve full term of sentence imposed by the court with a small period deducted for good behaviour in jail.

Essex. At present there are 135 jails in England and Wales. One hurdle to be overcom by the Government will be finding sites for the new jails that do not provoke strong local opposition. In Salford, where plans for the Agecroft iail have been opposed. Prison Service officials are understood to be already looking for another site in case the planning inquiry finds against them. Another problem is that the Government's expansion being overtaken by the rapid rise in the prison population, which has rendered projections published six months year the Home Office projectyear 2004 of 59,900, a figure that on present trends could be reached by Christmas. The prison population, which has been rising at about 250 a week, was 57,633 yesterday and is now expected to reach

62,000 by March next year. Penal reform groups argue that the rapid rise reflects the fact that judges and magis-trates are taking note of the public mood for action on crime, and the tough rhetoric on law and order from both Tory and Labour politicans in the run-up to the general

For Mr Howard, however the rapid rise in the prison population means that he needs to battle for additional funds to provide emergency accommodation for inmates secure the cash to implement security and training recommendations in Sir John Learmont's report into prison

Further work is being undertaken on the proposal to build a supermax jail for the most violent and disruptive prisoners in England and Wales before ministers make a decision. It would cost at least £100 million.

The need to build new prisons means that yesterday's proposals will have to be phased in over several years. Automatic life sentences for second-time violent and sex offenders and minimum terms for third-time drug dealers would be introduced by October 1997 because their impact on the prison population would be small.

Abolishing automatic early release and parole and minimum sentences for third-time domestic burglars, which would have big implications for the jail population, would not start to operated untile October 1999. Even then the effect of the proposals for for burglars would be limited as each offence would have to be committed separately after the the Bill was implemented.

German machinegun, hand gre-nades, stun guns, ammunition, anti-personnel mines, swords, combat knives, a mace and a crossbow - which had been seized from passengers passing through Heathrow were put on in an exhibition of the extent to which gun and knife culture has now spread around the world. Some of the knives had serrated edges up to lft long.

Some weapons had been cunningly concealed: a belt buckle contained a knife, a lipstick tube held a blade. Officers found a pen which could fire a 22 calibre bullet and another which could emit CS gas. All could be used to hijack an aircraft or attack a

"It's a frightening collection," said Detectice Chief Inspector Ken Price, of Heathrow CID.

They are found every day of the year," added PC Adrian Lauric. They are being carried by ordinary members of the public. They think there is no problem bringing them into the country."

One man who had been clearing mines in Ghana decided to bring some of them home as souvenirs. "Weapons are coming from all over the world, and from the United Kingdom when people try to take them out of the airport." Mr Price said. "They are being carried by people in transit and by people arriving with them. They are usually picked up at the Heathrow security search points." Police are taking a tough line with anyone found carrying a weapon. The policy now is to arrest anyone carrying an offensive weapon through Heathrow," he said. They will be charged under the Aviation Security Act."

It is also an offence to possess something that looks like a weapon or a bomb, such as several "joke" alarm clocks seized from passengers' baggage that look like sticks of dynamite.

Mr Price said that the most frightening recent incident was when an elderly American was found to have been carrying a loaded handgun in his cabin baggage on arrival. "When he went through the transfer search the item was found. How does somone get such an item into his luggage on a flight? The weapons being brought into Heathrow have obvious implications for the security arrangements at foreign airports. We do our best to be secure here, but we have got no control over the security arrangements at other airports." PC Laurie added: "If you look at some of these items you say to yourself, 'How did they get them through security and what sort of security have they got if we are finding them here? It must be some kind of accolade to how secure we are at Heathrow."

Many of those passengers found with guns, knives and other weapons came from the United States, despite the Clinton Administration's declared intention of having the tightest security checks

Non-American airlines and many Governments, including Britain's, are opposed to the new measures, which they say are designed to "export" American legislation and to force competing airlines to have the same slow and expensive check-in procedures faced by passengers boarding American airlines to fly to the US.

Council uses contracts to curb sale of knives

The scheme is the idea of Michael Carr, a Labour councillor, who said that he had been greatly moved by Nikki's killing. The public needs to be protected, and we feel that banning combat knives from shops in Middlesbrough is a positive step. Since Nikki Conroy was killed, other terrible events have occurred and we don't want them to continue."

In 1994, the 12-year-old schoolgirl was stabbed repeatedly by Stephen Wilkinson in front of her classmates, two of whom were injured. Wilkinson was sent to a mental hospital after admitting manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility.

Mr Carr called for the Government to back the council's move with legislation. The Prince of Wales is following in the footsteps of his ancestors with his call to improve young lives

Mixed results when royalty crosses the class divide.

MODERN royalty has a tradition of descending from its murky pool of its subjects' misfortune, with results that range from the patronising to the practical.

The Prince of Wales's proposed millennium crusade to help the young to develop new skills may directly improve many lives. In contrast, his great-uncle Edward VIII was a handwringer, although all biographers maintain that he had a genuine sympathy with the poor and the unemployed of the Depression years.

Most memorably, confronted with urban squalor on a visit to South Wales mining villages in the dying weeks of his brief reign in 1936, he done." Cabinet ministers were wary of the King's excursions to his country's more tattered fringes. Ramsay MacDonald noted in his diary: These escapades should be limited. They are an invasion into the field of politics and should be watched constitutionally.

The King was undoubtedly affected by what he saw. He wrote to his mother. Queen Mary: "The visit was very strenuous and heartrending. but the spirit of these poor people is marvellous." Nothing, of course, was done; the King was preoccupied with a woman, and by the December of that year he was gone.

His capacity for inaction was in the sharpest contrast to his brother, who became George VI. As Duke of York, he was actively and passionately interested, not so much in unemployment, but in breaking down class barriers among the young. His annual camps for 400 boys brought together pit lads and public schoolboys. After some initial uncertainty on both sides, they became a great success, constantly oversubscribed, until the outbreak of war put paid to them for good.

After the First World War, with unemployment near 10 per cent, the Duke had become president of the newly formed Industrial Welfare Society, which sought to improve the lot of the factory worker. During a visit to McVitie and

and partly a result of class His first step was to orga-

He found a campsite in a redundant aerodrome at New Ronney on the Kent coast, and invited 100 public schools and 100 factories to send two boys each. They assembled in the Royal Mews at Buckingdation, many of the industrial boys wearing bowler hats. But the week-long camp was a great success and became an annual event, moving to Southwold Common, Suffolk.

The Duke wrote that his camps were "playing a part in oiling the wheels of industry with good fellowship and understanding". A boy who at-tended the first camp agreed: The public schoolboy came to know his brother, the factory hand, as a keen sportsman and staunch comrade. This came at a time when it was much needed, when men are striving after a false shadow of

CONFIRMATION of what Northerners have long suspected - that Jesus was a Yorkshireman — is provided this week with the publication of the Gospels in Yorkshire

Christ's love leads us on path we may fear to tread

Jeremy Vine

TWO things happen next week: it is Hallowe'en, and my wife is 30. I am not sure which is scarier.

Any reminder of the speed of life, particularly a birthday with a zero in it, is bound to bring a twinge of terror. Hallowe'en is more spooky than scary. though the horror film of that name was as horrible as any I can recall.

In the Bible the aposte

John says: "Perfect love casts out fear." These are words that strike a chord because I always had trou-ble believing that the opp-osite of love was hate. Hate suggests mutual attachment, just like love. Hate, surely, is a force for conection. Fear is the opposite — a recoil. To really hate God requires faith as strong as any preacher's. A panicked neighborn rang a few weeks back.

There is a spider on my staircase and I am trapped in my lounge. Please come quickly." I entered her flat cautiously, only to find a cautionsly, only to find a pitiful little creature. Afterwards I asked her: what if there had been no one to belp you? "Well, last time the police," she replied. People are terrified by different things. Some-times big people are fright-ened of little things, and then you find small people who are frightened of nothing. Some are driven to God by fear alone: maybe the fear of being trampled in a Harrods sale-style stampede to Heaven, or of some scaring judgment and then the waste disposal chute into the River Styx. Or perhaps just fear of being alone, here and now. My fear is not being

"We took a long look at personal pensions and thought we could do them better, for less."

7 e started Virgin Direct because we thought that people had been getting a raw deal from financial services companies.

We knew we could do better. Right from the start our competitors said we would never succeed. Fortunately, they've had to eat their words.

Already, in our first 18 months 80,000 people have £400 million invested with us, making us a top ten PEP provider. And since launch, our PEPs have always been amongst the very best performers.*

Next we went on to offer life insurance, keeping it straightforward and easy to set up.

Two hundred years after the invention of life insurance, Virgin Direct was the first company to insure your life over the phone.

A lot of our customers said to us "Why don't you do the same for personal pensions?"

When our competitors got wind of this, their predictable response was, "No chance! Pensions are too complicated. They need to be sold by a salesman. The public don't

So we took up the challenge and set out to create a really special personal pension. But we soon made a remarkable discovery - the Chancellor had got there first!

The government is so keen for you to save for your retirement that it's giving away money - pots of it - to encourage you. I always thought of myself as reasonably switched on about these things but I had no idea how much the tax savings are actually worth.

The big question for us was 'Why isn't everyone claiming what's rightfully theirs?' So we asked people. The answer we got was that they found pensions boring and daunting. Having taken a good hard look at what the market had to offer we had to agree. We knew we could do better. Here's how!

First, we make sure that you can get all the help you want, when you want it. We have friendly, authorised advisers available at the end of the phone from 8am to 10pm, seven days a week.

They can help you decide if a personal pension is right for you and how much to invest.

Next we created a simple, reliable way of giving you the benefit of your tax breaks. We looked for the best way to invest your money to combine good growth potential with the lowest possible risk. And our charges are amongst the lowest you can find. After all, it doesn't make sense to throw away the valuable tax breaks by paying outrageous charges.

Virgin Direct doesn't employ salesmen or pay commission. 80,000 customers have already shown us that you don't need salesmen if your products are good enough.

None of this is particularly clever. In fact it all seems very obvious. Which makes you wonder why the pensions industry has insisted on making pensions so damn complicated.

Fair-deal Duchess praises the bed and breakfast life

By BILL FROS

CTOBER 26 1996

THE debt-plagued Duchess of York yesterday lavished praise on a £23-a-night bed and breakfast hotel where she stayed while paying her own way on a family outing to

In the past the Duchess has been infamous for a five-star lifestyle, often funded by generous friends and admirers. Coincidentally her much-photographed "private" trip to the Staffordshire funfair came as final preparations are made for the launch of an autobiography. My Story, which she hopes will ease some of her more pressing financial worries

"We had a very good meal and a great time. It's a great place to stay and very comfortable," she said when she emerged from the farmhouse hotel. Beeches, in the Derbyshire Dales village of Waldley. The hotel charges £23 a head, The Duchess's office would not comment on suggestions that she had embarked upon an economy drive.

At Alton Towers yesterday she took out her own credit card to buy tickets, instead of trying to get free passes on offer to celebrities. Lunch was also paid for by the Duchess, £5.98 for two portions of chicken nuggets and chips for her children, Beatrice and Eugenie, and £4.95 for chicken pasta and salad for herself.

Barbara and Paul Tunnicliffe, who have run the Beeches for ten years, would not reveal the name used to book the rooms, but said they were surprised when the Duchess

The Princesses were seen playing outside Beeches early yesterday morning, running around the yard with the farm cats. The Duchess slept in and did not appear until 10.15am. She signed the guestbook simply as "Sarah" in a long flowing hand, with the Princesses adding their own names below. No address had been written down in the space provided.

An Alton Towers spokeswoman said: "The Duchess has gone back to some of the rides she had already visited and is enjoying some of the bigger rides with her friend, The Princesses obviously love the animals and went back to the farm."

She confirmed that the Duchess had spent £69.50 on a two-day pass to the park for herself and her daughters, adding that it was not unusual for "celebrities" to pay their own way.

FROM ANDREW FINKEL IN ISTANBUL

IN A macabre crime that has baffled police and shocked the Turkish people, thieves made their way into an Istanbul cemetery to snatch the body of Vehbi Koc. the founder of the country's most powerful business empire.

Employees of one of the Koc-owned companies who had intended to pay their respects at the grave raised the alarm on discovering that the cement lid had been prised open. The contents were missing except for a shoelace and a piece of shroud.

Koc, who died on February 25 aged 95, founded the conglomerate that bears his name. It is easily Turkey's largest company, with an annual turnover of £6 billion. A vice-president of the group said the grave-robbing "continued to defy all rational explanation", although press speculation is that the perpetrators will demand a ransom.

The removal of Koc's body so close to Turkey's national holiday next week has been greeted with outrage and dis-belief. Koc was regarded as someone whose career mirrored the rise of the Turkish republic. If Kemal Ataturk founded the Turkish nation. Koc created its prosperity. Russian Army 'on brink' of mutiny

FROM RICHARD BEESTON

THE Russian Defence Minister, General Igor Rodionov, gave a warning yesterday that the country's armed forces were on the verge of an "uncontrollable crisis.

In the latest cry of help from the military, which many believe may be ready to mutiny. General Rodionov told a meeting of former combat veterans that projected spend-ing on defence would cover only about a third of the country's needs.

The country's leadership and society should know that chronic under-funding has taken the armed forces to the brink of undesirable, and even uncontrollable, develop-ments," the general said, "If the 1997 defence budget is not corrected. Russia may lose the armed forces as an integral and capable state structure and will have to face the

"Russia needs mobile, combat-ready and technically equipped armed forces whose power should be well known to any potential enemy," he said in a clear effort to win the support of those in the military who oppose the cutbacks reforms would involve. Although General Rodio-

nov's remarks must be viewed in the light of the current attempt by all government ministries to win a larger slice of the proposed budget, which is under review in parliament, his warning nevertheless was taken very seriously. Twice this month General Aleksandr Lebed, the dismissed security

Russian soldiers, who are often asked to help on farms, carry cabbages given them for working in a field at Gorodishche, west of Moscow chief, has predicted an insurrection in the autumn unless the military receives its wages and supplies.

His warning took on an added sense of urgency when an anonymous letter, written by officers in the general staff and addressed to General Rodionov, threatened to take unspecified action against the Kremlin leadership unless their back pay was paid by Government) abandon their plans," the officers said.

President Yeltsin, who is esting at a sanatorium outside Moscow before his open heart operation next month, has clearly been unsettled by the signs of disgruntlement. However, he seems determined to keep a lid on the armed forces by sacking unruly officers. Yesterday, in his latest radio address, Mr Yelisin warned senior offici-"We have enough force to als, particularly in the armed forces and the police, that they face instant dismissal if they air their complaints and feud

A number of senior officials at the Defence Ministry and the Interior Ministry have been dismissed for this reason over the last few days. That is what is going to happen to anyone who will quarrel instead of doing their job," he said. He was referring to a recent purge among top officers, including the chief of staff, the deputy commander highly successful head of the organised crime squad in

In spite of his warning, however, Mr Yeltsin did not offer any solutions to the chronic lack of funding for the armed forces, whose infrastructure is rapidly falling apart. This week a leaked CIA report published in The Washington Times said that Russia's control over its nuclear arsenal had weakened as a result of "wrenching social

Last week General Boris Gromov, an MP and the last commander of Soviet forces in Afghanistan, said that the plight of the military could not be exaggerated. He said that 60 per cent of navy's ships and submarines were not seaworthy, that the ground forces would lose their last serviceable helicopter in four years if current supplies continued, and that all armoured vehicles would grind to a halt by 2005.

Gaullists shaken by salary scandal

FROM BEN MACINTYRE

FRESH scandal has struck the Gaullist party amid reve-lations that the son of Jean Tiberi, the Mayor of Paris, was paid by the state-owned airline Air France for nearly three years after he left the company to become a ministe

Dominique Tiberi, already the focus of a city housing scandal, left his job at Air France in May 1993 when he have a deaty third of the Head became deputy chief of staff to Roger Romani, Minister for Parliamentary Relations, But his salary continued to be paid by the airline until last December, according to Le Monde. On June 19 the Prime Minister's office "discreetly" repaid more than Fri.1 million (£150,000) to Air France for wages and social security benefits paid to M Tiberi, but only after a judicial inquiry into the payments was under way, the paper said.

M Romani confirmed the money had been repaid by the Government, but insisted the reimbursement was made after Air France itself pointed out the "anomaly".

The inquiry into M Tiberi's finances comes after allegations that numerous false salaries" were paid by Air France to political appointees. M Tiberi has acknowledged being paid by Air France after he stopped working for the company, but denied that he had been paid a double salary. He was interviewed by judicial police for an hour on Thursday. "It must be verified, for the sake of formality, that Dominique Tiberi was not picking up two salaries, as he claims," an investigator told Le Parisien.

M Romani said the salary paid to M Tiberi was unconnected with other payments made to ministerial employees by Air France as political favours in the 1980s.

One senior adviser allegedly paid a monthly wage by Air France was Gérard Colé, former head of the French lottery. who is under investigation on charges of corruption. Between 1981 and 1985 seven advisers to Mitterrand were paid by Air France but were not employed by the company.

"At the time it was normal," Michel Vauzelle, who became Mitterrand's spokesman and Justice Minister, told Le the Elysèe in 1981 I was told that advisers' salaries had been taken on by public companies. I was paid by Air France until 1985."

Jean Tiberi, who took over as Paris Mayor from Jacques Chirac in May 1995, is already under investigation for alleg-edly ordering the refurbishment of a city-owned flat for his son at a cost to taxpayers of more than Frt.5 million.

Floundering Dole vents anger on unheeding voters

BOB DOLE, reeling from the fallout of his disastrous overture to Ross Perot, has begun venting his frustration on the American electorate in a virtual admission of defeat.

As even his campaign aides voiced despair over the Perot debacle, Mr Dole brusquely demanded at one campaign rally: "Wake up, America! You're about to do yourself an injustice if you vote for Bill Clinton." At another, he plaintively asked: "Where is the outrage in America?".

Expressing amazement that the country could re-elect a President so flawed, he continued: "I wonder sometimes what people are thinking about - if people are thinking at all. Mike McCurry, the White House spokesman, advised the 73-year-old Republican "not to accuse the American people of not thinking when you're trying to enlist their support".

Mr Dole was furious that the media learnt of his campaign manager's secret trip to Dallas on Wednesday to urge Mr Perot to quit the race and endorse the Republican ticket. However, Republican officials, including some of Mr Dole's own advisers, were equally angry with him for ordering an initiative The New York Times termed "looney". The move reeked of desperation and gave Mr Perot's moribund campaign 48 hours of priceless publicity. It stood practically no chance of success, given the Texan billionnew Reform Party and anger at Mr Dole for barring him from the presidential debates. Mr Perot not only dismissed

Mr Dole's approach as "weird and totally inconsequential", but he also exploited the media's renewed attention to launch a searing assault on Mr Clinton's "huge moral, ethical and criminal problems" that exposed the feebleness of Mr Dole's attacks. "I don't understand it. We gave Perot a forum for his anti-Clinton platform. It may be worth a few points for him," one scnior Dole adviser

Mr Dole failed to consult even Haley Barbour, the Republican Party chairman, or his wife. Elizabeth, before sending Scott Reed to Dallas. He evidently believed Mr Perot, languishing in single figures in the polls, might seize the chance to avoid humiliation on November 5 but, in the words of another Dole official, he left his own troops

"stunned and dispirited". Tom Pauken, the Texas Republican party chairman, said it was "hard to fathom how such an effort could be successful". Another state chairman said Mr Dole's move "told the whole world how sick his campaign is". William Pascoe, the American Conservative Union political director, said it "makes Dole look nathetic and desperate". A front-page article in The

New York Times yesterday described the Dole campaign as "besieged and disordered" thoroughly demoralised and plagued by mishaps.

The Republican candidate, an awkward public figure to begin with, these days often finds himself standing in front of small crowds, or shouting over a screechy or failing sound system, or watching as balloons drop or confetti shoots off in the middle of a speech, or taking the stage to such metaphorically challenging music as the Mission Impossible theme, or driving off in his limousine and leav ing part of his motorcade

Yesterday Newt Gingrich, the House of Representatives Speaker, said that he would not seek to lead a Republican minority if, as seems possible his party loses control of Congress on November 5. ☐ New York: Nasa is hoping.

to arrange for an astronaut in space to vote in the presidential election (Quentin Letts writes). John Blaha, who is on the Russian space station Mir, was so busy training that he forgot to organise an absentee ballot before he blasted off last month, Mr Blaha, from Texas, has told Nasa that he would like to vote, and negotiations are being held with Texan authorities to allow the astronaut to indicate his preference via coded e-mail. If this does not come off, it may be possible to allow Mr Blaha's wife to cast his vote.

Widow aims for Congress in guns battle

IN HEMPSTEAD, LONG ISLAND

AT DAWN on Thursday a slight, blonde, middle-aged man stood on the platform of this suburban community's railway station and greeted commuters arriving for the 50-minute ride to Manhattan.

"How yer doin"?" she asked. I'm Carolyn McCarthy. I'm running for Congress." Sleepy eyes lit up. "Preciate your courage," said one. "Saw you on television. You did od. Sure I'll vote for you," said another.

Twice a week Mrs McCarthy starts her 17-hour day by spaigning at Long Island stations. Since June she has appeared at 23 of the 24 in the There is just one that she will not visit, and that is Merillon Avenue, five minutes from her home. She avoids it for the same reason she is now running for Congress. It was at Merillon Avenue on Denber 7, 1993, that the 5.33pm from New York opened its doors to reveal a scene of carnage ban. She was — and still is - a registered Republican, but vowed in her fury to run against him as a Democrat. "She wanted to do something so Dennis didn't die in vain," a friend said. The Democrats, who need 18 more seats to regain the House of Representatives on November 5, were thrilled to recruit Mrs McCarthy. The political neophyte was invited to address August's Democratic convention. She was embraced by the media. She has built an army of 850 volunteers, raised $600,000 (£385,000) in donations and received huge support from the national Democratic Party, the labour movement women's organisations and gun-control groups. She claims Mr Frisa backed the repeal to please the National Rifle Association, which has contributed $10,000 to his campaign, and believes he grotesquely misjudged the mood of his district.

It was the latest in a series of police shootings that have enraged the black community. The city of 240,000, which two weeks ago hosted the vice-presidential election debate, is usually known for its elderly population and year-round sunny beaches.

Residents woke yesterday to find pictures of Los Angelesstyle rioting dominating the front page of the local newspaper. It was an ugly reminder that racial tension exists in most American cities, even though it has barely been touched upon in the election

Angry bystanders chamed Stop police brutality in the black community", while stones and bottles were hurled at police in full riot gear.

As the violence began on Thursday, leaflets appeared calling on police to stop "the US war on the African-American community". About 500 police struggled for hours to control the violence, using teargas and dogs. Guns were fired at police cars and stones were thrown at fire-engines trying to tackle at least 28 fires set during the rioting.

They were tossing everything at us but the kitchen sink," one officer said.

Saudi extremist linked to bombings

FROM REUTER IN DUBAL

OSAMA BIN LADEN, named by American officials as a prime suspect in two bombings in Saudi Arabia, is a renegade businessman who has given a warning of a holy war against Americans in the homeland of Islam.

Counter-terrorism officials in Washington said on Thursday they had received a report from a foreign intelligence service that he had taken credit for the bombings in telephone conversations and had threatened to strike again. Twenty-four American military person-nel and two Indians were killed in the blasts in Riyadh last November and at a barracks in the eastern city of al-Khobar in June. Mr bin Laden has denied involvement in the bombings but said they were warnings that the United States should withdraw its forces from Saudi Arabia. Four Saudis who said in confessions on Saudi television that they were influenced by Mr bin Laden and other Saudi dissidents were beheaded in May for the Riyadh bombing. A Beirut newspaper close to Saudi circles said on Thursday Saudi authorities had arrested If people in connection with the June blast. They are being interrogated minutely and in utroost secrecy," al-Bayrak reported, adding that Prince Nayef, the Saudi Interior Minister, was following the interrogation closely. Last night Saudi authorities had no comment on the report. In a 12-page statement published in August in the London-based Arabiclanguage newspaper, al-Quds al-Arabi, Mr bin Laden called for a jihad, or holy war, "against the Americans who are occupying the land of the two strines [Mecca and Medinal". He referred to the American forces in the Gulf — more than 20,000 with scores of aircraft and warships, according to the United States — as a "crusader" army.

The London-based Saudi newspa

al-Hayat, said earlier this month that sources close to the Taleban militia had reported Mr bin Laden near the city of Jalalabad, in eastern Afghanistan.

US delays supply of arms to Bosnia

BY MICHAEL EVANS DEFENCE COURESPONDENT AND OUR FOREIGN STAFF

AMERICAN tanks and guns bound for the Bosnian Government to re-equip Muslim-Croat Federation forces stayed on a ship in the Croatian port of Ploce last night, after Washington demanded that certain conditions be met before the arms were unloaded.

The huge supply of weapons, including 45 M60 tanks, 80 MII armoured personnel carriers, 15 UH1H helicopters. 840 light anti-tank weapons and 45,000 MI6 rifles, should have been unloaded from a chartered freighter as part of the American train-and-equip programme. However, Washington has insisted on the removal from office of Hasan Cengic, the Bosnian Deputy Defence Minister, whom it says is a Muslim nationalist with close links to Iran. Washington brokered the Muslim-Croat Federation and pledged to equip its forces with heavy weapons once the Dayton peace accord had been fully implemented, in order to create a balance of arms between the federation and the Bosnian Serbs. The total arms package is worth about $100 million (E63 million) and includes training for the federation forces. Yesterday an official at the American Embassy in Sarajevo said the arms shipment was unlikely to be unloaded for several days. If President izetbegovic agrees to remove Mr Cengic, the arms will be sent to registered storage sites as required under Dayton. Yesterday Zajedno, the Serbian opposition coalition led by Vuk Draskovic, threatened to beycott next month's parliamentary elections, accusing America and its allies of not wanting to send observers to guard against fraud.

Jeffrey Erickson, 51, who resigned soon after the company announced $14 million (E8.8 million) losses, was asleep in London when the Boeing 747 crashed off New York's Long Island, which gave an impres-sion of absenteeism.

Norway has new Prime Minister

Oslo: Thorbjoern Jagland was appointed Prime Minister of Norway, but his Labour Government faces its next test at the polls in less than a year. King Harald V appointed Mr Jagland, 46, after accepting the surprise resignation of Gro Harlem Brundtland, who has dominated Norwegian politics for 15 years. She said she wanted to give Labour a fresh start. (Reuter)

Romania jails two journalists

Bucharest: Two Romanian journalists were jailed for accusing President Iliescu of being a KGB informer while he was a student in Moscow (Sean Hillen writes). Sorin Rosca Stanescu, the

Bulgarians go to the polls

Bulgaria votes for a new President tomorrow as the country battles with its worst economic crisis since the end of communism in 1989 (James Pettifer and Our Foreign Staff write). Opinion polls put the main opposition candidate Petar Stoyanov, 44, a lawyer, ahead of Ivan Marazov, 54, the Culture Minister.

Pompeii site yields more secrets to British team

FROM RICHARD OWEN IN POMPEI

A STRIKING and unusual gold signet ring from the first century AD has been found by a British archeological team at Pompeii, digging in a hitherto neglected part of the ruins. Professor Andrew Wallace-Hadrill, director of the British School at Rome, who is in charge of the British project's excavations, said the ring and other newly unearthed artefacts showed there were still exciting discoveries to be made" in areas of Pompeii abandoned or left unexplored for lack of resources.

The British School team, in collaboration with Michael Fulford, professor of archaeology at Reading University, has been given permission by Pietro Guzzo, the new Super-intendent at Pompeii, to restore a block of houses closed to the public. Pompeil, which was overwhelmed by an erup-tion of Mount Vesuvius in AD 79, has been extensively excavated since 1748.

However, much of it re-mains unexplored, or semiexcavated using crude techniques -- "shovels instead of trowels", in the words of one team member. Whole sections are cordoned off and exposed to the elements. The British School team, working with Italian experts led by Salvatore Nappo, a noted an international effort to rescue Pompeii from further

Wallace-Hadrill: a new "flash of insight"

Hadrill said they had been rewarded with "a new flash of insight into what life was like when the volcano struck".

Much of the volcanic material covering the site was removed in the 1950s for use in motorway construction. Archaeologists dug down to pavement level but did not publish the results. The British School team is now exploring below pavement level to piece together clues about the earlier history of Pompeii.

The house where the ring was found has been dubbed "The House of Amarantus", the name etched in black ink on some of the dozens of large amphorae unearthed in the courtyard. The seal on the gold ring bears the image of a mule. The body of a mule and a dog were found, perfectly preserved, lying in a stable

"Our assumption is that Amarantus sold wine in the amphorae, and perhaps oil, fish sauce and dates," Profes-Wallace-Hadrill said. Wine was sold from a bar on the street corner.

More than 60 of the jars have a characteristic Cretan shape and had apparently just been brought in from Pompeii harbour while the volcano rumbled menacingly above. In an area behind the bar the team found small ritual burial pits containing male poultry bones, suggesting that Amarantus or an earlier occupant not only sold wine but staged cocklights for punters. No body was found in the house. But near by Professor preserved a striking tableau of fleeing human figures. Some are crouching, some sprawling, and one appears to be trying in vain to cover a companion. Like the House of Amarantus and some beautifully restored gardens planted with vines and roses, the group of figures — the only one preserved where it was found — is closed to the public because there are not enough guides and guards.

We must find a better balance between conservation and tourism," Professor Wallace-Hadrill said. "Even the central parts of Pompeii are not properly looked after. The picture we have goes back 100 years or more and needs fundamental reassessment. The Pompei that seems familiar to us is actually un-

S tephen Jay Gould, one of the most popular and controversial science writers, returns to the evolution battle ground in this Times/Dillon forum on Monday. November II. Yet hope could soon be around the corner, in the determined form of Esperanza Aguirre, Spain's Minister for Education and Culture. An admirer of Margaret Thatcher, she is determined to return Spanish schools to them the compulsory teaching of simple, unadorned

The wrath of Señora Aguirre was aroused days after she moved into her offices on Madrid's Calle Alcala, "I was going through textbooks when it dawned on me that there was no mention of Julius Caesar." She sent out an official to buy more books, only to discover that the landscape of history as taught in Spanish schools was more barren than that of bleakest indeed, large swaths of the

Opera buffs sound note of optimism

MADRID will soon shake off its down-market status as the only Euro-pean capital without a proper opera nouse. The authorities promise that the city's casa, the Teatro Real, will reopen next October, 71 years after an aria was last performed there. Built in 1850, it closed for repairs in 1925 when cracks were found in the walls, presumably caused by sopra-nos. Opera has not been staged there

The theatre was reopened by Franco in 1966, but as a venue for orchestral music only. It limped on for two decades, only to close again. Originally scheduled for 1990, the reopening has been postponed repeatedly. The initial budget was £15 million: more than E75 million has been spent so far. Last year a giant chandelier hurtled from the ceiling as the Minister of Culture was inspecting progress, miss-ing her by the breadth of a false moustache. This year the theatre's

Socialist-appointed director was sacked in a row with the conservative Government. It is with wry amusement that Madrid has noted that the work with which its theatre reopens is de Falla's

US embargo under fire as Vatican envoy goes to Cuba

By RICHARD OWEN

THE Vatican yesterday paved the way for a meeting between the Pope and President Castro by sending its top diplomat to Havana for the first time in more than two decades and launching a propaganda cam-paign against the US embargo of Cuba.

Cuba is the only Latin American country not yet visited by the Pope, whose travels since his election in 1978 have earned him the title of "the Pilgrim Pope". He underwent an operation two weeks ago for the removal of an inflamed appendix but is keen to demonstrate that he is fully back in charge. He is expected to appear for his St Peter's Square address tomorrow and next week will publicly celebrate the fiftieth anniversary

Mgr Jean-Louis Tauran, the Vatican's foreign minister, set off yesterday for Havana by way of Madrid. He is the highest-ranking Vatican official to go to Cuba since 1974. Relations have cooled, but the Vatican argues that although President Castro leads one of he world's last Communist regimes, the Catholic church in Cuba has gained a measure of freedom. No meeting between Archbishop Tauran and the Cuban leader is scheduled, but Vatican officials said it was "not ruled out". If the visit goes attend the Word Food Summit in Rome in November, which the Pope is to open. This in turn would open the way for a papal visit to Havana.

This week Cor Unum, the Vatican's humanitarian arm which oversees the work of Catholic aid agencies, issued a report on world hunger which sharply criticised the United States for its embargoes on Cuba and Iraq. The report said that economic embargoes hurt ordinary people more than the regimes they were aimed at. "The human costs of such measures must be more carefully weighed," it added. Archbishop Paul Josef Cordes, president of Cor regimes were considered threat to world security the effect of blockades was "to enable them to hold their own peoples hostage". Last week Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, a senior Vatican figure close to the Pope, condemned the Helms-Burton Act reinforcing trade embargoes on Cuba and other "pariah states".

The report said hungry and mainourished people had "the right to food", a phrase the US wants to keep out of the World Food Summit communique.

In the Arctic, insulation experts recommend seal skins and whale blubber, but in Britain they warm to Pilkington K Glass. They'll tell you it was specially developed to make double glazing more efficient and save you money.

Ask them how, and they'll explain that it's all down to a microscopic metal coating that reflects heat back into your home. Heat which ordinary glass allows to escape.

In fact, Pilkington K Glass offers up to 30% better insulation than normal double glazing. So you can turn your heating down and still be just as comfortable. And of course you'll be more than comfortable with the reduced bills.

Our glass doesn't just improve your financial outlook. By making windows warmer to the touch, its special coating greatly reduces unsightly condensation. You won't get steamed up over the price either, as it's only a little more than ordinary double glazing.

> For more information on Pilkington K Glass, you can call free on 0800 556000 or press an expert for a quote. It's by far the best way to keep your house, or igloo, warmer.

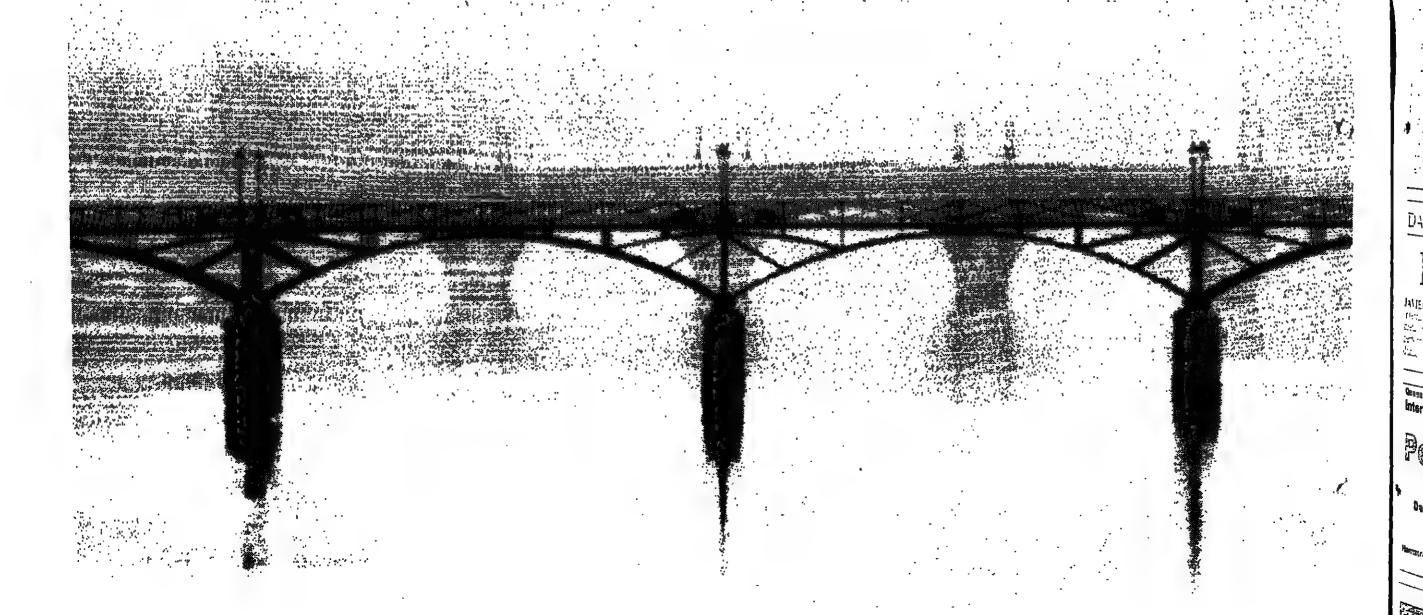

Experts say it's the best glass for double glazing.

to be a very trish affair, its Irishness hardly at all diluted by managerial and artistic input from Britain in the 1970s and 1980s. It was as much the super-abundani charm of the town and its people that kept audiences returning year after year as the repertory of operas either forgotten or simply overlooked (sometimes with good reason).

Even to mention Wexford's Irishness nowadays is politically incorrect on an epic scale and liable to draw accusations of racism, as though all the reasons for which one loves the country were somehow un-mentionable in polite society.

I remain incorrigibly impolite, and shamelessly nostalgic for the days when you heard the odd Irish singer and conductor, and when the chorus was noticeably Irish instead of mostly from Eastern Europe. Now we have "Euro-Wexford", arristically directed by Luigi Ferrari of the Pesaro Rossini Festival, proudly boasting of its international casts recruited from Peru to Korea. One thing has not changed, and that is the wheel of fortune determining which of the three operas draws the shortest straw as regards performance standards. This year the best opera was the worstperformed, the worst opera the best-performed, and the indifferent one was a right curate's omelette.

Parisina is middle-period Donizetti (1833), based on Byron and sombre in colour. The melancholy soprano heroine is married to a pathologically jealous Duke of Ferrara (baritone); unwisely she talks in her sleep, betraying her chaste affection for the tenor, whom the Duke murders despite discovering that he is his own son from a former marriage. Most of it is top-drawer Donizetti: a powerful post-sleep-talking hate duet, a chastely romantic love duet, a sumptuous quartet in the second linale, and much skilfully set conversation and plot development within formal numbers. It certainly deserves revival.

And it certainly deserved a better performance. The conductor (Maurizio Benini) showed little sympathy for Donizetti's gently poetic idiom and simply bashed through the score; the soloists followed suit with singing so relentlessly loud that the management should have handed out earplugs at the door. The baritone Roberto Servile suggested how good he could have been with better guidance; the young soprano Monica Colonna made a spirited attempt at a role written for an enormously experienced prima donna: the tenor shall remain nameless. There was no production to speak of. Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord (1854) is the most frightful tosh, and interminable with it (nearly four hours): a cynically manufactured opéra comique innocent of even rudimentary characterisation and wobbly of narrative (it is about an incognito Peter the Great and his Richard Morrison's column returns next week future wife, the vivandière Catherine). Meyerbeer did nothing by halves: there are two, not one, coloratura sopranos, and one of them goes mad for no discernible reason to the accompaniment of not one, but two flutes. The few - very few - decent bits of music were used by Constant Lambert in his score for Ashton's Les Patineurs. Dammit, the piece was quite brilliantly performed. The young Russian conductor Vladimir Yurovsky coaxed crisply stylish play-ing from the National Symphony Orchestra, and the French producer Denis Krief brought enough the hours pass with minimal pain. Elizabeth Futral, star of Pesaro this year, delivered yards and yards of perfectly placed coloratura, and Darina Takova gamely followed suit. The Russian bass Vladimir Ognev was spectacularly miscast Zdenek Fibich's Sarka (1897) is an odd one. The Czech composer (1850-1900) never quite made it as the third point in a potential Smetana-Dvorák triangle, and you can see why: the score is lateromantic by the yard, hideously competent but no more - the clinching musical idea, the longedrialise. The subject is mythi-co-heroic, the "Maidens' War" following the death of Libuse, matriarchal founder of the Czech nation. The plot is predictable: the fierce warrior-maiden Sarka falls for the MCP tenor, saves him from her bloodthirsty sisters in arms, and hurls herself over a precipice.

nga Levant's production, in unpleasing brutalist-modernist decor by Charles Edwards, was full of "ideas", but ideas are of little avail if a director has a shaky command of getting people on and off stage or finding something for them to do when they are there. This was theatre of embarrassment. But the conductor David Agler made as strong a case as possible for the score, and there was some sensational singing. The Bulgarian soprano Svetelina Vassileva (Sarka) is a discovery on the Gorchakova scale: beautiful, sword-like soprano tone allied to real musical sensibility. The Slovak mezzo Denisa Stepkovská was no less startling, and the Russian bassbaritone Anatoly Lochak, a great Wesford favourite, delivered streams of firm, warmly modulated sound as Premsyl. Nobody could say that Fibich wasn't given the best possible chance, musically at

Bringing the house down

EVERY so often some politician blathers on about the need to adhere to a bundle of precepts labelled "Victorian values", revealing woeful historical ignorance of a society that elevated ignorance, small-mindedness and hypocrisy above understanding and tolerance. Consider how Victorians received the first productions of Ibsen's thrilling drama, now superbly revived in a production by Anthony Page.

This newspaper's critic located a "total lack of dramatic action" in the piece, other comments collected by Michael Meyer in his edition of the play include "morbid and unwholesome" (Standard), "pre-tentious inconclusiveness" (Observer). These people tied the blinkers of convention over their eyes every bit as tightly as Nora and Torvald blinkered theirs, until Nora tore them off and walked out of the doll's house of her marriage.

The role of Nora requires the actress to be on stage for every moment of the first two acts, and for all but the opening scene of the third until she picks up her suitcase and departs, leaving her husband to brood for a moment till the street door slams downstairs and the curtain falls. For Janet McTeer this performance is a triumph of detailed and sustained perception. creating first the portrait of a twittering airhead, childishly proud of her clever secret; next, lancing this nonsense with shafts of terror on realising that the money she borrowed (to save her hus-band's life) involved her in a criminal act; finally, the emergence of a woman determined to be herself instead of a plaything. At the beginning she hums merrily to herself, jigs up and down when excited and gives occasional squawks of embarrassment that Owen Teale's complacently patronising Torvald clearly finds adorable. He wouldn't want her any other way, and says so. McTeer constructs a defensive battery of hand gestures to ward off what Nora finds unpalatable, pushing back the long blonde little-girl hair that keeps falling forward, flicking impatiently at the air as though pestered by gnats. But these gnats are thoughts, her honest thoughts, and finally they settle upon her. A year after the assassination of Israel's Prime Minister, Amos Oz considers who should bear the real responsibility

Terrainly, not the Israeli right wing. Not the Likud party, nor the West Bank settlers, nor the Orthodox Jewish community, nor the Hawks. But it was indeed from parts of those quarters that we heard the hateful voices towards Rabin, while some of their leaders - who could have tamed the anti-Rabin incitement - preferred to fuel it. And now, their much-needed soul-searching has apparently been postponed: they seem to have more urgent business. Actually, many of these leaders have one and only one piece of business, namely the idea of a "Greater Israel". For the sake of this idea, some of them have been painting peace in the colours of disaster and turning the public debate surrounding peace into a hunt for traitors. But no. these are not the people who murdered Rabin. These are a very devout

The vast majority of the population in Israel is willing, with certain provisions, to make a historical compromise with the Palestinians

in mind, some of the intransigents of the "Greater Israel" ideology are donning a different cap nowadays. They are pretending to be the guardians of Israel's security and the vigilantes of Palestinian violations of the Oslo accords. Yet it is common knowledge that even had the Oslo accords bestowed heavenly peace on Israel, with not so much as a single Palestinian violation. nor a single Israeli casualty, those same people would still be preaching that there is no reason for us to make any concessions at all to the Palestinians.

For several months this year, between April and September. there were indeed very few violations of the agreements on the part of the Palestinians, and these resulted in only a small number of Israeli casualties. Full of hubris.

green light for opening the controversial tunnel in Jerusalem, for putting off redeployment in Hebron and for increasing Jewish settlements on the West Bank. The hawkish logic behind this is: when all's calm on the Palestinian front, why give them anything at all? Why not take from them, acre by acre, land which is still theirs?

For 30 years, fundamentalist elements within the hawkish side of the Israeli spectrum have been reducing all of Judaism into a rite of Holy Places. A choir of fiery rabbis, who have never bothered to utter a single note of Jewish morality about society's starving and homeless, its battered women, its justice or injustice, its compassion - these rabbis have condensed all of Jewishness into the holy tombs of the Patriarchs. They may from their own Jewishness, but they are not guilty of killing Rabin: they are very devout people.

himself and his accomplices are guilty of slaying Rabin. No one else. Still, the inspiration for the murder may well have sprung from the shrine in Kiryal Arba, erected in memory of another Jewish murderer, Baruch Goldstein, who died in the course of murdering 30 Arab worshippers. and who has become the hero of an ultra-nationalistic religious sect. This sect worships Goldstein's memory and makes pilgrimages to his grave, where a monument has been erected. It would have been easy for Rabin's murderer to deduce that he, like Goldstein, would be elevated to martyrdom. That, by killing Rabin, he, too, would be promoted by some to sainthood "in the name of a Greater Israel".

No, the adherents of a "Greater Israel were not involved in Rabin's death: they are, after all, a very devout group of people. Nevertheless, some of them are responsible for spreading the monstrous notion that all the means are sanctified if the end is a "Greater Israel". An end which justifies all means is not an end but a vicious obsession. And this particular obsession still hovers above the monument of the murderer from Hebron, as well as some other places where people are being taught that for the Holy sake of a "Greater Israel", anything goes. There it stands, this outrageous shrine, every day, every hour, attracting worshippers and pilgrims alike - a ratification of Rabin's assassination and an incitement for more spilling of innocent blood. The Goldstein cult must be outlawed, with no further delay. Had all the Torah sages, all the Jewish clergy, all the rabbis, stood as one immediately after Goldstein's massacre of innocent Arabs in Hebron to excommunicate and exorcise the Goldstein cult, to erase his name and his memory -Yitzhak Rabin might still have been with us today.

Goldstein, the target of religious damnation and furious excommunication. This happened, perhaps, because some of the very devout group of people are more devoted to a "Greater Israel" than they are to the Sixth Command-life for peace. We were wrong: Rabin died in the battle over the question of who we are and what this nation really is all about.

In previous generations, it true, holy tombs in the Land of Israel were conceived of as symbol. ic segments of the Jewish sense of identity. Maybe there will come a day when they will be considered so once more. But for now, Jewish fundamentalists have managed to turn those sepulchres from a symbol of identity into a dark threat to our collective identity. Eagerly waving flags over ancient tombs these people do not hesitate to cause the need for tresh graves to be dug.

Yitzhak Rabin died because he turned his back - and ours - on tombs. He opted for life in line with the Torah, which commands us always to choose life. Let us not sanctify Rabin's memory, or his grave. Rather, let us sanctify life and justice and freedom and reason and realism: For it is for these values that Rabin lived and died. 🔔 no longer lynch priests, of course, but if you wear the wrong sort of war-paint, or think the wrong sorts of thoughts, they will froth at the mouth and hurl imprecations at you. Anything fractionally to the right of centre is dismissed as facha, the tribe's argot for "fascist", and "conservative" is for them a dirty word. Imagine, then, the rage that Opus Dei provokes on the Left, especially at a time when the order boasts three ministers in the present conservative Spanish Cabinet, as well as the President of the Cortes. This Roman Catholic lay order, founded in 1928 by the recently beatified José Maria Escrivá de Balaguer, is openly revited. "Oh, he's from Opus." is the routine dismissal provoked by the mere mention of a politician, or an academic. or a writer, who belongs to the order. even in Spaniards who profess to be liberal.

This sneering tone is faithfully reflected in a new book on Opus Dei, just published in Madrid, its author, Jesus Ynfante, is an old Opusbaiter, and once more attempts to lio was too wily for that, preferring, perpetuate canards about the order: that it is a sect which brainwashes the young, that its members pursue a blind personality cult, that it is power-hungry. that it is "fascist" and seeks to effect a right-wing takeover of the Roman Catholic Church, that it is an unsavoury "freemasonry", that its founder was a vain charlatan.

I think that it is time to hit these myths on the head and stand up for Opus Dei. (Being a Hindu, I am, of course, not a member.) The roots of Spanish suspicion lie in the order's role under General Franco. Here, too, some tidying up is first needed. The order had no truck with the fascists. It is often forgotten that the Falangist press sniped at Opus Dei throughout the 1960s, to the order's great discomfort.

Opus Dei never was, nor is it now, a political party or pressure group. But unlike the Jesuits, Dominicans. Franciscans and others, its members have never been supposed to withdraw from the world. On the contrary, the order teaches members to take an interest in material welfare, to tackle society's problems and solve them. As Brian Crozier wrote in his notable book on Franco: "Onus Dei teaches an un-Spanish philosophy of success, offering the puritanical alternative of hard work in place of the passive acceptance of God's will which has often relieved pious Spaniards from the urge to toil."

it was this "Protestantism" that n Spain the Left is still an has always aroused the suspicion of intolerant tribe. Its members many Spaniards — and not just on many Spaniards - and not just on the Left. In addition, Opus Dei is always accused of secrecy. If the order was somewhat secretive under Franco, it must be remembered that those were hardly times of candour in politics. In any case, this reputation is exaggerated. They are listed in the telephone directory, and everyone in Spain knows which schools belong to Opus Dei, which university, which bankers, which journalists and academics, which politicians. The unfounded charge that Opus Dei is in pursuit of political power stems largely from the role the order played in restructuring the Spanish economy after 1957, when they appeared to corner the ministerial market after Franco's inspired Cabinet reshuffle. However.

as has been pointed out Laureano López Rodo, one of the pillars of the technocratic reforms that rescued Spain from the stagnation of "autarky" and placed her firmon the path of Western-style prosperity. Franco's Governments were never dominated

by Opus Dei. The Caudiinstead, to divide and rule. In any case, he did not recruit ministers because they were members of Opus Dci: he did so because of their intellectual merits and their proto-Thatcherite" economic views.

It would be facile to describe their presence in Franco's Cabinet as an open endorsement of his dictatorship. They would, quite simply, not have been in the Government had Franco not elected the path of economic reform. Opus Dei chose to regard the period as one in which Spain could concentrate on the creation of a prosperous and efficient economy, and with that, a stable society. Of course, they were not as assiduous as some other groups in distancing themselves from Franco, but then Opus Dei has never claimed to be anything other than conservative. As a devout Roman Catholic order, it had love neither for Communism nor nostalgia for the Spanish

Second Republic. Part of the problem lies in a complex culture clash: Opus Dei is a proselytising outfit in a country where assertiveness has always been shunned. It cultivates intellectual excellence in a land which has generally been content with mediocrity. It seeks to revive core Christian values in a society which has surrendered itself to agnosticism and spiritual emptiness. The order and its members deserve respect, not opprobrium. Most of all, they deserve a fair hearing.

homas Pakenham hugs trees. Before a big storm he goes out, puts his arms round his favourite beeches, measures them one more time and wishes them luck. Storms are the natural predators of trees. Pakenham feels they are entitled to our respect and, in moments of stress, our embrace.

To escape life's turmoil, some contemplate the glory of birds, some nose around old churches. some find serenity in an English garden. Pakenham's solace is trees. They are to him what they were to the ancients, temples to his ancestors and objects of mystic wonder. In Meetings with Remarkable Trees he tracks down his 60 best specimens across the British Isles. They are all old. Indeed his book is a celebration of age. His camera caresses the wrinkles, ridges, car-buncles and contorted limbs of his loved ones. This is not a book of saplings. ecological damage. The pestilential organisation, renamed "Forest Enterprise" to cleanse its name. marches yet across the landscape. What pollution has been wrought in the name of the Great God Tree!

Pakenham calms me down. Not for him the tourist trees, the King Charles oaks and flowering therries. His are the solitary grandees of field and forest. His eye invests them with extraordinary character. When I first encountered the giant "Majesty" oak at Fredville in Kent i thought it ugly, a monster stimp with elephantiasis. Its girth of 40 feet makes it the thickest tree in Britain. Yet to Pakenham it has "the scale of a mammoth with the grace of a monarch". He points out that it both tapers and towers, and the crown is still full. He is right. Even that old Methuselah, the Bowthorpe oak in Lincolnshire, with room for 20 to dine inside, may look like a battered helmet with sprouting plume. But thousands have worshipped at this shrine. Into its bark the youth of centuries has carved its love, confident that age cannot wither nor custom stale the names thus joined in passion. Some of the graffiti date back to the 18th century.

After the oaks come the everreens. We stand in awe before the Great Fir of Dunkeld, at 212 feet the highest tree in Britain. It is only a century old: its Oregon cousins can last three centuries and rise to 300 feet. We track down the fragments of Caledonian forest at Rothiemurchus. Here Scots pines, splayfooted among the juniper, are to be saved from the deer by the reintroduction of wolves. We even encounter that rare thing, a sitka spruce allowed to grow to maturity, at Scone arboretum. Normally, says Pakenham, these are "pushy, spiky, ill-tempered brutes with blue-green needles apparently made of barbed wire". Small wonder they are so beloved of Whitehall and the Inland Revenue.

Next come the mighty Redwoods, the tailest in England in a grove at Whitfield in Herefordshire. These massive beasts, 30 tons of solid wood, are still growing. They are less than half the height of their equivalents in California and may yet outstrip them. In the early sun, they still "give a sniff of the Pacific"

He selects for special praise those at Tandridge, Surrey, and Much Marcle, Herefordshire. The latter is certainly a tree grown lovable with girth and age, a Falstaff among yews. And he watches over that masterpiece of English gothic the effigy of Blanche Mortimer inside the adjacent church.

In an impressive work of detec-tion, Pakenham identifies three of Wordsworth's four Lake District yews, including that at Lorton, "of vast circumference and gloom profound... Of form and aspect too magnificent/ To be destroyed." And he pays his respects to what was probably the oldest tree in England, Gilbert White's yew at Selbourne. After some 1,400 years it fell in a gale in 1990. Mortified, the parishioners propped it up and prayed for its survival. It pushed out a pathetic suckling, as if to say goodbye, and died. It stands today as a stump, in memoriam to the

If I have any quibble with Pakenham's choices, he seems over-fascinated by crabbed age at the expense of living splendour. The cedar, sentinel of the English parkland, is represented by sad amputees from the Great Storm of 87. His only chestnut is at Tortworth, less a tree than a monstrous Rorschach blot. I also miss the starburst of a Samuel Palmer "magic apple". Lastly we should not have to trek to Bryanston to see that most monumental of Engish hardwoods, the common plane. This is the townsman's tree, green engineering, the Londoner's umbrella and air filter in one. Picture it surely in Berkeley Square.

Pakenham is at his best with the beeches. This is the tree of his Irish estate. It is nature as architecture, strong in form and delicate in detail. "Its trunk rises like a tower of smooth grey stone; its branches fall like the spray of a fountain." At this time of year, the beach is yielding its most glorious fruit. liver Rackham, in his History of Landscape. points out that trees are the natural covering in temperate climates. When we are dead and gone, trees, not scrub or grass, will recolonise the land. Come the day, Pakenham even puts his money on the common birch, to seize its chance and walk first down the streets of Edinburgh". The clearing of the wildwoods of Britain with primitive flint and iron' tools, says Rackham, remains the most astonishing engineering feat of any age. Even with modern saws, it took the early settlers a century and a half to clear New England for farming. In the last century, the woods have returned. With set-aside they will return also to Britain.

The message of this book is that our woodlands are now a giant arboretum. We know what we have, and we know how to manage it. But in the greatest trees, in Pakenham's patriarchs, we have organisms, things that are more than wood, leaves and oxygen. Many of the specimens planted over the past two centuries are still in their childhood. Their full majesty will be enjoyed not by our children or grandchildren, but by generations and communities unknown and unimaginable to us. Guarding a great tree is a gesture of futurity. It is the nearest we get to touching eternity.

There is no optimism to match that of the true woodman. • Meetings with Remarkable Trees: published by Weidenfeld and Nicholson at £25.

The show is to be pulled, against the vehement protests of the Indian High Commission, after 20 years and hundreds of Tully contributions, Tully, who had represented the BBC in India for more than two decades until 1994, left the corporation in disgust at the changes wrought by its director general, John Birt. Still a broadcasting legend in the sub-Continent, however, he has not been short of work, According to my source at the BBC, "Mark did this programme not only for sentimental reasons but also to show the BBC what it will lose if it cuts back the World Service.

PRINCE AND PEOPLE

The Crown sets an example in supporting civil society

Since its publication in The Times on Monday Frances Lawrence's moving and eloquent manifesto for civic renewal has dominated public debate. Politicians have rushed to appropriate her insights as their own and stitched her heartfelt pleas into their platform rhetoric. Beyond Westminster, the inchoate sense that civil society needed refurbishment has found vigorous expression in her words. Individuals and voluntary groups have rallied to her side and now the Prince of Wales has intervened by drawing attention to the disabling effect of youth unemployment on the nation's life. The Prince is better fitted than most to contribute to the debate on how to sustain and nurture civic virtues. His commitment to practical help for the excluded young long medates the recently acquired concerns of some politicians and he deserves support.

The Crown rests at the apex of civil society, what the historian Frank Prochaska has called the "commonwealth of citizenship outside the State". Even as politicians have allowed the size and pretensions of the State to increase, even as they have yielded to the clamour for rights without duties, even as individuals have found new incentives to retreat behind their privets, voluntary endeavour and charity work have proved surprisingly resilient. And the spirit of voluntarism has found its champion in an institution whose existence depends on its detachment from politics - the monarchy.

The Crown has, through all the upheavals of recent years, continued to provide a philanthropic example. The Prince of Wales and Princess Royal attend more than 400 charitable engagements in an average year. The Prince's Trust has in the twenty years of its existence helped provide employment to thousands and hope to more. Its efforts have been directed in particular at the inner cities and towards ethnic minorities, providing asportunities for individuals who feel nected by politics. The Prince's Trust should not be caricatured as simply a means of distributing bounty from the gracious to the needy — it has equipped young people with skills and imbued them with a spirit of enterprise which gives them independence and a chance to contribute.

The Prince's announcement yesterday of the scheme's expansion and his appeal to businessmen to join him in a "millennium crusade" against youth unemployment are both welcome. With 600,000 people under 25 out of work, the scale of thwarted potential and the misery of lives impoverished. demands a response. It is not the first occasion on which an heir to the throne has drawn attention to the waste of men who wish to work lying idle. In 1932 the then Prince of Wales made a speech on social service which resulted in the creation of 2,300 self-help and charitable projects to help the unemployed. It is to be hoped that Prince Charles's speech can stimulate a similarly energetic response.

The level of youth unemployment should be a concern for any government, but the capacity of government to intervene for the better is limited. The State cannot create wealth, only spend it. Any job government creates depends on making commerce less competitive and depriving industry of its capacity to grow. A voluntary effort to help individuals to develop and exploit their talents is the most effective way of guiding them into fulfilling jobs and building a society which is in the Prince's own words, "cohesive, tolerant and understanding".

In the Queen's Christmas Broadcast of 1991 Her Majesty argued that "democracy depends, not on political structures, but on the goodwill and the sense of responsibility of each citizen". Her son's work provides a channel, outside political structures, for directing goodwill and a means of fostering responsibility. In the campaign to strengthen civic bonds the Prince is an appropriate champion.

GENE DETECTIVES

Whodunnits on science's new frontier

The spectacle of a scientist crying "Eureka, we have mapped a eukaryotel" is unlikely to set the world's pulse racing. But from time to time we can pick from the proliferating rush of new scientific data a project which clearly promises a new understanding so wide and potentially valuable that its progress is worth marking and celebrating. Biologists. linked by a maze of electronic pathways from Tokyo to Tampa, are approaching the 21st century with barely conceale t. Down the Internet links stream packages of gene-sequencing data which, when combined and refined, are making slow sense of the map of human genes. Well before they have the answer, molecular geneticists sense that they hold the key to a down which will open fields of exploration which even they can barely imagine.

The genome project, designed to map the entire set of human genes, comprises one of the most elaborate multi-national research efforts ever networked. This year has seen one variety of yeast mapped and this weekend a consortium of 104 scientists have put a map of 16,000 human genes on the Internet. They hope that the total will rise to 50,000 - or around half the total - during next year. Pictures of the innermost mechanics of existence are coming into focus. In the words of a scientist involved in mapping the DNA blueprint for a rare microbe found two miles deep in the Pacific, cracking the code is like opening a new porthole on Earth and discovering a new view of the Universe.

Those unaccustomed to decrypting genetic code are denied the pleasure of peering through the porthole, but can enjoy the benefits of discoveries made by those who do. Since much debate about genetics is dominated by fears of "bio-engineering", mutant mice and memories of Nazi horrors, the benefits of gene-mapping are worth rehearsing. The maps are the basic tools on which all further progress depends. So pivotal is each new sequence, or fragment of a sequence, that scientists are locked in arguments about whether research institutes should download their latest data on to the Internet each night or wait a little longer to have it checked.

The wealth and variety of uses to which genetic information can be put may obscure a simple but priceless benefit. Biologists predicted that genetics would revolutionise medical science and so it has proved. With less than a quarter of the genome mapped, important breakthroughs have already occurred in investigations into Abheimer's disease, colon cancer and cystic fibrosis. Those are merely examples of "smoking gun" discoveries where evidence of genetic predisposition leapt out from the sequence. Geneticists talk enthusiastically of systematically "interrogating suspects" in order to track down the more elusive causes of other illnesses.

Genetic inquiry has been compared in significance to the Manhattan Project to build the atomic bomb, or the first moonshot. But those landmarks exploited knowledge; gene-mapping creates vast new areas of knowledge which can then be exploited for good or bad. Some suggest that the genetic mapmakers are to be compared to the explorers who criss-crossed the Earth's surface in the 16th century. But the best comparison is to a lesser-known but still seminal achievement, the 19th century establishment of the periodic table. Dmitry Mendeleyev's discovery that chemical elements show periodic recurrent properties when arranged in a certain order also took many decades to refine, opened myriad new avenues in chemistry and is still in use today. So it will be with genetic maps.

GAELIC SOAP

An aerial battle in Ireland

As every stamp-collector knows, one of the first acts of the Government of the newlyformed Irish Free State was to overprint all stamps in Gaelic and change the official name of the country and the capital. Gaelic was embraced as the living witness of the new nation's separate history, culture and identity. For years no civil servant could work for the Irish Government without proven knowledge of the language. Huge sums were spent in an attempt to revive a tongue that famine, emigration and English hegemony had reduced by 1911 to a mere 17 per cent of the population.

Gaelic, however, has not died. Indeed it has seen a remarkable revival. The designated Gaeltacht has shrunk to the western fringes of Connaught and some of its offshore islands; in only a handful of villages is Gaelic heard in shops and pubs. Yet almost a third of modern Ireland's population now claims an acquaintance with the language, even if not as a mother tongue. Night-classes are booming and the urban young are enthusiastic speakers. As ever, language and politics go together; Gaelic has been embraced with fervour in republican West Belfast. Indeed, it has been said that the "jailtacht" rather than the Gaeltacht was the real cradle of today's revival.

Gaelic has now arrived on the small screen. For over four hours a day a Galway television station is to broadcast a mixture of news, dramas, culture, soap-operas, quizzes and comedy in the language. Consuming an annual subsidy of £15 million, the likely size of the audience will probably make Teilifis na Gaelige one of the most expensive broadcasting operations ever attempted. Opponents are denouncing it as a white elephant, and say the money would better be spent in schools. Supporters claim that it will outshine the successful Welsh language channel, S4C, and Ros na Run, its promised Irish soap, will attract 300,000 viewers.

Blarney is perhaps too dismissive a word for these hopes. But even if the world's Irish rally to the studios, the chances of an indepth Gaelic Panorama breaking news on the Afghan civil war or making "Ruairf Bremner. Cé Eile (Who else)? a cornedy hit are slim. Local issues are the stuff of local languages: those who have studied Eskimo dialects say their conversation is largely confined to the state of the ice or the weather. Can we expect much beyond hurling scores, fishing records and the date when the sun last appeared on Gaelic quizz shows?

Television, however, is undoubtedly the key to any revival. No language that cannot compete with Neighbours will ever be the medium of teenage gossip; if Ireland wants to nourish its cultural heritage, it must begin with couch potatoes.

Sir, Your editorial of October 21, "A question of questions", held that it is now too late for a referendum on the Maastricht treaty. However, the referendum on continued membership of the EEC in 1975 was held two years after the Government had signed up.

The constitutional changes inherent in the Maastricht agreement are far more radical than the common market trading arrangement which the public was told it was considering in 1975. It is now even more imperative that the full issues of European Integration are dealt with once and for all, by putting them to the British people in a referendum.

against Smithian economics!

From the Bishop of Leeds

Sir, William Rees-Mogg (Bishops or party pawns?". October 23) both mis-understands and misrepresents The Common Good.

It is not a list of detailed policy prescriptions. It is a presentation of the social teaching of the Catholic Church, drawn almost exclusively from the teaching of successive Popes. This teaching is a set of moral princi-ples intended to educate people's con-sciences, and it follows from the fact that Christian faith has an inescapable, if sometimes neglected, social dimension.

Rees-Mogg makes assertions and attributions about the document which are ill-founded, for instance on Europe, on bureaucracy, on subsidiarity and on a statutory minimum wage (which is not advocated but noted as one possible option). The document takes a balanced view of such institutions as the market, which could not be guessed from his selective quotations. He criticises the document for holding views which I presume he dislikes, but which it does not contain,

He accuses the bishops of softening their attitude to abortion, when the right to life is in fact singled out as the leading issue discussed, and when it is described as "the one fundamental right" from which all others flow.

The document recognises that the general election is not a single-issue referendum, but asserts that Catholic electors will take account of the views of individual candidates. A candidate's views and track record on abortion may be so actively "pro-choice" that Catholic electors should not vote for that candidate, even if on other grounds they would wish to do so.

The Common Good highlights moral values in political and economic life, which are never value-free zones. It provides a rationale for discussing these matters systematically and seriously, without improper intrusion into party political controversy.

From the Associate Curator (Mammals) and the Assistant Curator (Zoological Collections). Oxford University Museum

Sir, Prompted by the fate of some of the Eton College natural history collections (report and leading article, October 24), we would like to caution against equating the disposal of stuffed animals with the modernisation of museum displays.

Many successful museums still display stuffed animals and the prolifera-tion of extremely popular "discovery rooms", of which the favourite exhibits are taxidermy-based, shows just how valuable these objects are.

Such material represents an important resource for education: no wildlife documentary can replace the ex-citement of touching the real object, as anyone who has seen a small child find out how heavy an elephant tooth is, or just how smooth the fur of an arctic fox feels, will know.

Indeed, this is recognised by the current curator at Eton, Dr David Smith, who intends to include taxidermy specimens of British animals in his new displays. Coming as we do from an institution which is often condemned for disposing of most of its stuffed dodo, leaving only the head and a foot, in an 18th-century attempt at modernisation, we know the risks inherent in the assumptions which you have made.

From Mr Alan Bird

Sir. I note that Channel 4 is to apologise for depicting scenes of sibling incest (report and photograph, October 25). Quite right too: this sort of filth should be discouraged. Why can't Channel 4 follow BBC

Radio 3's example and show something wholesome, such as Saturday's broadcast of Die Walkure? Yours faithfully, ALAN BIRD,

Eric Halsall, broadcaster. died on October 21 aged 76. He was born in Burniey on March 18, 1920

n a 14-year period com-mentating for the BBC series One Man and His Dog. Eric Halsall brought the wisdom of the Lancashire uplands. among which he was reared. to elucidating the complexities of the sheepdog trial. Of all farm animals, the border collie is unique in its intelligence and its sensitivity to the moods of human beings. It was Halsall's ability to describe the subtle relationship between the shepherd and his dog that brought the programme so vividly to life.

Audiences composed of city wellers nurtured — if they had thought about it at all on the notion of the shepherd as a vaguely biblical figure, striding with crook in hand at the head of his flock, found themselves transfixed by the tensions inherent in attempting to pen sheep - never the most tractable of animals - in difficult terrain and often inclement weather. What had been thought of as a marginal activity, enacted "somewhere out there" by a race of men remote from the concerns of modern existence, was brought into suburban living rooms with compelling force.

Halsall was aware of the fine line between success and failure in sheepdog trialling. He was able to imbue the business with a sense of elemental struggle which gripped audiences. His sympathetic commentaries put the dog where it deserves to be, at the centre of the drama. Workalongside the pro-gramme's presenter, Phil

Drabble, he commentated on more than a hundred programmes during the 14 years he was associated with One Man and His Dog. But it was not merely as a commentator that Halsail's concern for the work of shepherds and their world manifested itself. As a course director, he was a familiar figure at sheepdog trials up and down the country, brian clamped between his teeth, as he set up obstacles to test the resourcefulness of both dogs and their masters.

Eric Halsall was educated at Burnley Grammar School and spent most of his working life in that area of the West Pennines. He grew up in the bleak yet fiercely beautiful hills which surround the Victorian industrial towns of Burnley and Clitheroe, and early developed a love of natural history.

After leaving school he trained as a surveyor with a local firm. When war came in 1939 a heart condition roled him out from service in the Armed Forces. Instead, he travelled the country doing surveying work for the Government. For several years after the war he worked as a journalist on the Burnley

But it was his association with the National Coal Board which set him off on the path that was to shape his life. In 1951 he joined the NCB and was soon appointed its farms manager. In this post he was responsible for maintaining thousands of acres of farmland in the hills of Lancashire under which mineworkings run and for which the NCB had responsibility.

This led him into working relationships with the farmers who lived off this land, which was for the most part given over to grazing sheep. His interest in nature and in the rhythm of the farming year imbued him with a profound respect for the men whose lives are lived on this harsh terrain, and the dogs on which they rely for their livelihood. He became aware of the importance of sheep - physi-"visible" than cattle - to the

The genesis of One Man and His Dog was a rain-sodden trial held at Leek Staffordshire, in 1974 at which the television producer Philip Gilbert happened to be present. Gilbert was enthralled by the skill with which Halsall endeavoured to make sure that each competitor was given equal opportunity. Listening with fascination to Halsall's descriptions of the qualities of different competitors, Gilbert also realised that he was a natural broadcaster. By that time he had also become convinced that sheepdog trialling could be an absorbing television spectacle.

At first there was a natural suspicion in the ranks of the International Sheep Dog Society (ISDS) to the possibly invasive attentions of tele-

the Secretary of the ISDS, Lance Alderson, believed that importance of the sheepdog to British agriculture deserved wider currency. In the end they won the confidence of the shepherd community. The result was a programme which, against all the apparent odds at the outset, became compulsive family viewing.

SIR HUGH WILLATT

Sir Hugh Willatt, former Secretary General of the Arts Council, died on October 18 aged 87. He was born on April 25, 1909.

HUGH WILLATT'S association with arts administration came about more by accident than design. Destined by family background for a legal career, he went to school at Repton, winning an exhibition from there to Pembroke College, Oxford, where he read Modern History. After taking his degree, he returned to Nottingham to join the family firm of solicitors, Hunt, Dickens and Willatt, and soon became a partner. But he always retained more than a dabbler's interest in the theatre in particular and in the arts in general. This interest was inspired initially by his parents who introduced him to the theatre at an early age, and entertained the local repertory companies, so inspiring a passion for drama, and empathy with actors which was to last throughout Willam's life. He always loved to tell amusing, but never malicious, anecdotes about the famous — many of whom became his friends.

Most of his leisure time even as a young man was spent in amateur theatricals at the Philo Dramatic Society, and in plans to provide in Nottingnam a theatre for plays not dictated by commercial factors. War service with the RAF in the Middle East and Italy intervened but this only gave him wider visions and greater ambitions. Accordingly, on returning from the war in 1945, he revived the plans for a Nottingham theatre, kept alive by his father, and through his negotiating skills, and the enthusiasm of his fellow trustees, the Labour-controlled council was persuaded to subsidise the Nottingham Playhouse, which opened in 1963. As a result of this, and many other contributions to the cultural life of Nottingham, including the production of a masque to celebrate the university's centenary, he was made an honorary MA of Nottingham University. In 1959 he had joined Lewis

London. This move enabled him to play a bigger part on a larger stage and in 1960 he became chairman of the Arts Council drama panel and then in 1968 Secretary-General of the Arts Council itself. His leadership, helped by his long experience in the arts, enabled him to guide the council during a time of three-fold expansion of its funds, much of which went to support artistic activities in Scotland, Wales and Regions.

The characteristic and lasting legacy of his period in office, which lasted until 1975, was his profound understanding of artists and arts organisation and his constant insistence on the duty of the council to respect the freedom of artists and to respond with innate sympathy to their endeavours even if, as was usually the case, money was short. This was achieved through his considerable powers of tact charm, and quiet persuasiveness, together with the constant support of his formidable chairman, and personal friend, Lord Goodman,

On retirement, Willatt was knighted for his services to the much to him but which he, typically, referred to with selfdeprecatory humour. He sub-sequently returned to the Silkin law practice, through which he briefly became chairman of Wembley Stadium He had always been an ardent supporter of Nottingham's two football clubs and of Nottingham County Cricket

He continued to give un-sparingly of his time to the arts as chairman of the National Opera Studio, the Ballet Rambert, the Nottingham Theatre Trust, the Riverside Studios, Hammersmith, and as a member of the boards of the National Theatre, the Royal Court Theatre and as a trustee of Shakespeare's Birthplace.

Through the diversity of his life, he made a large number of friends, and was never happier than when in their company - whether at the Garrick Club, in his "local", or on Gozo where he made his holiday home. He was predeceased by his wife, Evelyn Gibbs, herself a distinguished artist, who enlarged his interest in the visual arts, and supported him in all his ventures. There were no

In the New York of Prohibition even academics were drawn to a louche lifestyle and she was subsequently to recall that in those years "sex took up as much conversational space as in later years we would give to politics".

She and Trilling were married in 1929 and she was promptly thrown into an intellectuals' world in which at first she did not feel at home. She found her husband's friends who included figures such as Irving Kristol, Sidney Hook, Saul Bellow and Hannah Arendt -- "overbearing and arrogant" and railed against their lack of magnanimity and sometimes even of simple good manners. In the early 1930s she joined a number of Communist front organisations but her experience of them quickly disillusioned her, and fierce anti-communism later became her ideological hallmark. Her special targets were always cant or empty rhetoric in any work with its distinguishing rooted in rationality and

She first started writing in 1941 when she happened to hear her husband talking on the telephone to the literary editor of The Nation who had called to ask whether he could suggest someone to take over Giving him a reproachful look, she immediately picked up the phone and offered her own services.

For the next ten years, reading a novel and a haif a day, she stuck a sharp knife into many bloated literary reputations. It was not until she was 41 that she seems to have developed yearnings for a more normal life. She then after 17 years of marriage decided that she and her husband were evading their personal responsibilities by not having children, and at the age of 42 produced a son.

By then, however, her reputation as a critic was largely made - with her work appearing in magazines as varled as The New Yorker. Commentary, The Atlantic and Saturday Review. Unlike her husband, she by no means confined herself to literature, frequently commenting on social mores and sometimes even on political issues (in the famous feud between Lillian Hellman and Mary McCarthy she was, of course, firmly on the latter's side).

Her husband died in 1975 and the first charge on her time after his death was to edit a 12-volume uniform edition of his work. There were also two collections of her own criticism - We Must March My Darlings (1977) and Reviewing the Forties (1978). As well as producing her own memoirs. she edited two volumes on D. H. Lawrence. At the time of her death she had just finished working on a book to be called A Visit to Camelot, an account of an evening spent with her husband at the Kennedy White House.

She is survived by her son.

SATURDAY OCTOBER 26 1996 National Savings plans to shed 1,500 staff

NATIONAL SAVINGS plans to axe 1,500 jobs even though an independent watchdog said that the Government's savings arm needed more staff after a E50 million black hole was found in the accounts.

A secret National Savings document, Efficiency Plan 1996-97 to 1998-99, a copy of which has been seen by The Times, outlines plans to save more than £20 million. Staff cuts are expected to play a key role in achieving these savings. The existence of the management document, obtained by Derek Foster, shadow

Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, is the second embarrassment to hit National Savings after publication yesterday of a damning report by Sir John Bourn, head of the National Audit Office (NAO). In his special report, the NAO's independent comptroller and auditor general listed a catalogue of serious accounting errors at National Savings, which looks after £57 billion on behalf of 30 million people.

Sir John said the apparent lack of financial controls at National Savings "make it difficult to establish the precise liability of the Exchequer to National Savings investors with the possibility that provision may have to be made in luture from public funds to meet liabilities to investors not currently reflected in the accounts.

The NAO report called for more staff to be recruited to sort out the National Savings accounting system urgently and to identify the whereabouts of the missing £50 million. Sir John concluded that National Savings had yet to identify all posts for which accountancy expertise is required and their explanation. expertise is required and their strategy on training for finance staff still lacks some

Commenting on the proposed jobs cuts at National Savings, Mr Foster said: "It is a massive cull amounting to 30 per cent of jobs within the three offices manned by National Savings at Durham, Blackpool (Lytham) and Glasgow. We are entitled to know how this is to be achieved, whether it is to be on an office-by-office basis or if National Savings is preparing to close down one of their centres." He added: "Either way this will spell doom and gloom for employees and cause major economic problems in the areas where the centres operate.

The Treasury, which has insisted that the public's money is not at risk in National Savings accounts, last night said the confidential executive summary was only a draft and no final decision had been taken on staff cuts.

How Big Bang gave a boost to Britain's economy

EXECUTIVE.

to the Big Bang have been too simplistic. History is seldom simple. The Big Bang needs to be seen in the context of the wider changes that were taking place in economies throughout the world and in the world's financial services industry

The Stock Exchange was not the only market or institution that had to change its ways in 1986 to meet new challenges. It was, however, very important for the United Kingdom's place in a more competitive world that it should do so.

It is easy to forget now that right through to the 1970s Britain ran a restrictive and protected economy. There were dividend controls, price controls, exchange controls and high taxes. Government was most intrusive.

In the early 1970s, we saw the beginnings of deregulation in the banking world. In the securities markets, there were increasing international pressures, London had traditionally been an international centre for doing business, but this role was knocked for domestic investors to invest overseas: the mismanagement of the UK economy did not make investment in Britain attractive to overseas investors. During the 1970s, there was increasing interest in international business as institutional investors grew in size and as Stock Exchange member brokers began to look beyond the UK.

In 1970, the Stock Exchange changed its rules to allow its member firms to deal overseas under local rules because they would otherwise not be able to compete. The Stock Exchange also recognised, even before 1970, that firms needed to bolster their capital resources. The introduction of outside capital (but not control) was permitted in 1968. From the middle 1970s, the exchange launched into an increasingly liberal debate about the changes necessary to permit member firms to deal in international equities from London since they could not hope to compete with overseas firms that were not subject to the Stock

The real cause of the Big Bang was the abolition of exchange controls in 1979. From this moment, change was inevitable. International flows of savings and capital were bound to increase, and the distinction between international equities and leading UK equities was bound to disappear. To compete with outside houses, especially those from the US, member firms of the Stock Exchange would need more outside capital. The Stock Exchange's debate on how to permit member firms to compete.

themselves increasingly eroded the fixed-commission system by offering free services to institutional clients, and brokers increasingly tried to do both sides of large deals, thus eroding to some extent the separation of capacity. Commercial pressures were thus leading to change. The resistance largely came from lieved very strongly that the sep-

of Fair Trading was bound to refer the Stock Exchange to the court in 1979. It put the exchange into an impossible position. Court proceedings are antagonistic, and the scope of the reference was undefined. Any alternative system of running the market would have been equally subject to court scrutiny. Worst of all, a court decision would have meant instant change with not enough time to plan an alternative market. The last thing that the exchange wanted. in its regulatory role, was disorderly markets. The refusal of the incoming government in 1979 to exempt the exchange was a great pity. Fortunately, it became increasingly dear within government, as a result of work done within the exchange, and particularly in the Bank of England and the Treasury, that the court proceedings were an inappropriate way to dictate reform of the country's major securities market. Even Harold Wilson's committee in 1980 agreed that it was the wrong

Despite misguided political opposition, he proposed the necessary primary legisla-tion, which was enacted in March 1984.

Initially, the Government wanted us to keep the separation of broker and jobber, but we had shown conclusively in our preparations for the case that this was unlikely to survive fixed commissions went. Cecil Parkinson and I agreed that there should be three anda-half years to allow the exchange to plan the new market and to bring in the necessary technology.

This process, including the adoption of a market-making system, the decision to go for a big bang" rather than a phased introduction of changes, and the development of the SEAQ quotation display system, was triumphantly achieved within the agreed timescale, enabling the new market to operate from October 1986. The changes to the ings so that we could plan a membership rules allowing 100 per cent outside ownership were made in March of that year, having been agreed within the exchange quite separately from any agreement with the Government.

All these bold decisions were necessary to strengthen London in international markets, and particularly equity markets. As for the exchange, if it had not opened its membership to international players, it would have become a domestic backwater.

The changes unquestionably added to London's strength as an international financial centre. Trade in US, Japanese and leading continental shares in-creased enormously, and the contribution to the economy of London and of the United Kingdom has been of tremendous

National Grid gives way on price controls

By Ketth Rodgers

NATIONAL Grid has conceded defeat in its battle with Offer, the electricity industry regulator, by accepting proposals for tougher transmission price controls.

The decision ends three weeks of uncertainty as the company considered whether to seek a Monopolies and Mergers Commission inquiry into the review by Stephen Littlechild, the regulator.

The controls will cut almost El billion from customers' bills over the next four years, forcing the National Grid to reduce prices 20 per cent in the first year and keep prices at 4 per cent below inflation for the next three years. National Grid had fiercely contested Offer's original proposals and was thought to be bitterly disappointed that Pro-fessor Littlechild had made only modest changes to the final terms. However, a referrace to the MMC would have extended the dispute for up to six months.

Earlier this month unions argued that the proposals, which will require National Grid to cut operating costs by at least 4 per cent per year, could cost up to 800 jobs.

There was also speculation yesterday that the company might be encouraged to dispose of all or part of Energis, its telecommunications arm.

Acknowledging that the revenue reductions would have a material impact on the profitability of the transmission business, David Jones, group chief executive, said that the company was confident that it would maintain a progressive dividend policy.

Opinion was divided over the impact on profits although some analysts have argued that earnings per share could fall by more than 25 per cent after the proposals come into effect in April.

Meanwhile, Professor Littiechild has reached a onevear agreement with ScottishPower and Hydro-Electric on new trading rangements to second-tier suppliers, moving to a pool purchase price basis that is about 6 per cent lower than the present method.

Royal & Sun to sell stake

Royal & Sun Alliance, the insurance company, is selling its 71.8 per cent interest in South Africa's Protea Assurance for £98 million. The move is part of the rationalisation since the merger of Royal Insurance and Sun Alliance. Protea's general business goes to Mulual and Federal Insurance Company and the life and investment business to Commercial Union's 51 per cent owned South African arm.

GUS shares' fall after warning

BY OUR CITY STAFF

SHARES of Great Universal Stores, the retailing group, fell 21p to 6132 p yesterday after it said that pre-tax profits were likely to fall I per cent in the first half of the current year.

Lord Wolfson of Sunning dale, chairman and chief exec utive, told yesterday's annual meeting of shareholders that although group turnover was marginally higher than this time last year, profits would be affected by slower trading in the home shopping division "in a very competitive market".

Profits have also been adversely affected by the strength of the pound and the weakness of the rand, reducing South African earnings, which normally account for between 5 and 10 per cent of annual profits.

Pre-tax profits were £237.5 million in the first half of last year, up from £226.8 million. Lord Wolfson said there were no current plans to pay a special dividend from the company's net cash of El.1 billion. The shares have fallen from a high of 770p this year.

THE revolution at the BBC began behind closed doors in the Denver office of John Malone, chief executive of Tele-Communications Inc. one of the

ed as one of the industry's few "threedimensional chess players*, told the small group of executives that he was ready to proceed with plans to make the BBC a household name around the globe. TCI, through Discovery Communications, its US programming arm, and Flexiech, its British affiliate, would spend $750 million or more to develop and launch more than a dozen pay-TV channels based on BBC programming. Bob Phillis, the BBC's deputy director-general and the top British official at the meeting in Colorado. knew the BBC would never be the same again - Auntie was about to enter the commercial arena with a bang. There is

tion and choice, we have to open up on different fronts," he said. That was in February. Speculation in the press forced the BBC and TCI to disclose their plans last month. The announcement rocked the TV industry and came as a blow to BSkyB, no question that as we see more competi-

the satellite broadcaster 40 per cent owned by News International, owner of The Times. BSkyB had also approached the BBC with a proposal to develop BBCthemed subscription channels and was negotiating with the BBC right up to the time of the announcement. TCI won partly because the BBC wanted an international deal: TCI has 12.5 million cable subscribers in the US, and its farflung joint ventures and affiliates could give the BBC channels widespread foreign coverage.

Since then, Phillis, who is also chief executive of BBC Worldwide, the BBC's fledgeling commercial arm, and Richard Emery, managing director of BBC Worldwide Television, have been working to strike final agreements with TCI and Flextech. If all goes well, the first BBC subscription channels will be available on satellite and cable late next summer.

The creation of the joint ventures with TCI and Flextech marks a new era for the BBC because, until recently, its entire income — £1.8 billion in the last financial year — came from the licence fee. This may seem a fortune, but the BBC is struggling. As programming costs rise in a market bombarded with dozens of new TV and radio services, from the BSkyB channels to London's Talk Radio, the BBC has been shedding employees, combining operations and introducing "accountancy", a hitherto unknown term within the organisation, into the lexicon. While the overhaul has helped, it has not freed enough cash to keep the BBC on an even keel. Lack of funds meant that it lost the rights last year to the Grands Prix and the FA Cup, and other viewing favourites are bound to disappear as it severs fingers and limbs to keep the body alive. There are two possible solutions: raise the licence fee faster than the inflation rate, politically a risky move just before an election, or develop a stream of commercial income to prop up the core world's most powerful media groups. Malone, who has been describ-

operations. Phillis's job is the latter. in a sense. Phillis has come full circle. Until he joined the BBC in 1993 he had spent his entire career in the commercial world, with long stints in printing, newspapers and independent television. He does not fit the mould at the slovemoving and bureaucratic BBC and there has been speculation that he has come close to resigning on more than one occasion out of sheer exasperation.

Phillis admits to bouts of exasperation, but says that he is taking things in his stride in his effort to build a commercial business. "The culture here is different and there are those in the BBC who say it should stay a pure, public service broad-caster. To which I say, 'What's the

Phillis, 50. is an affable, burly man whose upfront style contrasts sharply with the lacquered charm of many of his media colleagues. He is unconventional outside the office too and disappears into the wilderness whenever he can. He and Jean, his wife, and their three sons like to ski, trek, take white-water rafting trips and climb mountains. Phillis left school at 15, and yearned to be an architect but entered the printing industry before winning a scholarship to Nottingham University. After graduating in industrial economics, he had careers with Thomson Regional Newspapers and the British Printing Corporation and was on the staff of the Scottish Business School and Edinburgh University.

His introduction to the TV world came in 1981 when he was managing director of Independent Television Publications, the publisher of TV Times that was then owned by the ITV companies. He was spotted by the newly formed Central Independent Television, and was made managing director; he ran the company until he joined Michael Green's Carlton Communications in 1987. Phillis professes enormous admiration for Green, but their relationship was said to be rocky and he departed in 1991 to become chief executive of Independent Television News, Two years later he landed at the BBC and became its rising star. At one point, he was considered the leading internal candidate to replace John Birt as directorgeneral. Earlier this year Birt signed on for a second four-year term, but Phillis has not given up hope. "If and when John ever steps down, of course I would be interested in applying for his job," he said.

To a great extent, his future depends on how well he manages the growth of BBC Worldwide. The job has political, as well as business, risks. Phillis has to turn BBC

Bob Phillis does not fit the BBC mould. There has been speculation that he has come close to resigning on more than one occasion out of sheer exasperation

Worldwide into a serious money-spinner, but has to do so without leaving the impression that his work is part of a covert effort to transform the BBC into a wholly commercial enterprise.

BBC Worldwide was created in 1994 and is charged with licensing and distributing the BBC's programming around the world, and publishing magazines such as Top Gear and Radio Times, books such as Delia Smith's Winter Collection and videos such as Pride and Prejudice and Wallace and Gromit. It is also responsible for the transmission of the BBC World Service and the development of multi-media prod computer company. In its latest financial year, BBC Worldwide had turnover of E338 million, up 11 per cent, and generated earnings of £77 million, up 44 per cent, all of which went to the BBC.

Phillis's goal is to triple BBC Worldwide's contributions to the BBC over the next ten years. Privately, he thinks it can do better. If so, the BBC will have a better chance of competing with the global players. What we will do is supplement the licence fee, not replace it," he said.

Getting into the pay-TV market was inevitable. The arrival of the "multichannel"

universe, which can bombard viewers with hundreds of analogue and digital channels, has created a voracious demand for programming, especially the arm, said: "The BBC language library of programmes in the world." What the BBC does not have is mandate to risk a penny of licence-fee funds. Programming is its currency. In Britain, at least, it appears to have struck a sweet deal. It and Flextech are equal partners in the joint venture formed to launch the channels. Flextech is putting up all the investment costs, estimated to be as much as £200 million, and will share the profits with the BBC. The BBC gets a double benefit because the joint venture will buy programming from it at market rates. The half-dozen or so BBC-Flextech channels will range from "catchup TV", replaying the BBC's top shows for those who missed them the day before, to Reaching final long-term agreements with TCI and Flextech will involve endless spare cash, and BBC Worldwide has no meetings with lawyers, programmers, bankers and TV executives on both sides of the Atlantic, and the expected December completion date is starting to look optimistic. The BBC has never before done anything remotely similar and will want to make sure that it is striking the best deal. Malone, the TCI head, strikes fear into even the most seasoned media executive. Phillis said: "I am not pretending this whole process is easy."

The forthcoming marathon is bound to test Phillis's patience, but his colleagues and friends are betting that he will emerge in one piece. "Bob has endless persistence and stamina," said Charles Independent Television. "He just keeps grinding away and he'll always be the last man standing at any meeting."

HIDDEN ASSETS

Tradition still pays its way for Theakston's brewery

nyone with a taste for rich, dark and smooth ales will be familiar with Theakston's Old Peculier, the beer that brought fame to the town of Masham at the eastern end of Wensleydale in North Yorkshire. Since 1987, Scottish & Newcastle has owned the Theakston brewery, a conchanged since its foundation in 1875. Its beers and pubs may now be acknowledged the world over as an undis-puted asset of the company, but the brewery itself is not so well known. History and heritage are paramount at Theakston's brewery, a traditional workmg concern where original equipment is used to make beers according to Yorkshire recipes written more than 170 years ago. The brewing tradition in Masham (pronounced Massam) began in the 1820s scion of a large and successful farming family, decided to branch out. He leased the Black Bull Inn and brewhouse in Masham and began making what soon became ales of considerable renown. When Robert died in 1875, his son Thomas opened a new brewery in Paradise Fields, also in Masham If Thomas were alive, he would probably still recognise it today. An electric motor powers the grist mills instead of a steam engine, and the copper is heated by an oil burner rather than the old open furnace, but apart from those changes, it still functions as he originally planned. When Thomas died in 1919, his sons Robert and Edwin took over the brewery and immediately acquired their local rival, the Lightfoot Brewery, complete with pubs and a cricket team. The brewery grew fast and a reputation for fine ales boosted demand so much that a new brewery was opened in Newcastle upon Tyne.

Theakston produces eight ales, not all of them available all year round; but it is Old Peculier that has won the brewery its fame. The tale of its name — and spelling — goes back to the reign of William the Conqueror and one of his captains, Nigel de Albini, who was rewarded for with the lands and estates of Mashamshire. His son, Roger de Mowbray, joined a crusade in 1140, was captured and held to ransom for seven years, until redeemed by the Knights Templar. On his church in Masham to the church of St Peter in York. The Archbishop of York was not much taken with the gift, however, as it carried with it ministering the law in Masham. So with doe archepiscopal aplomb, he freed Masham of all the customs and claims of his archdeacons and officials, and established the Peculier Court of Muslum to deal with the law independently. A descendant panel of the court still sits, made up of 24 Masham citizens and chaired by the vicar of St Mary's, Masham.

The Theakston team is not only skilled in the art of brewing. It also produces its own oak burrels. To supply wooden casks are made by hand — watertight vessels put together without using nails, screws or glue. There are only eight skilled coopers still working in a handful of traditional breweries across the United Kingdom, and one of them works at Theakston. There he trains his own apprentice coopers and toether they turn out oak casks of such ravity that are num-bered and catalogued. Eighty-year-old casks are still in use at the brewery.

Dispensing a pint is another art in itself. The head should not be foamy, but dense and creamy, remaining on the beer as it is drunk and leaving a lacing of foam on the sides of the glass. Even if it does take 15 seconds to pull one of Theakston's best, I am told it is worth the wait.

plunged 13012p, a drop of nearly 20 per cent, to 575p, after the bids were thrown out on the ground that a takeover would be against the public interest. South West's promise of a 20.4 per cent increase in the interim dividend together with a £15 customer rebate did little to break the share's fall.

One potential bidder, Severa Treat, the best performing FT-SE 100 stock, responded with a 30p jump to 605½ p, while the other suitor, Wessex Water, added 25p to 342 p.

Sailing in new waters

IT WAS a bad day and a good day for South West Water's management. Bad because the company went on trial for the latest in a series of pollution incidents; good because the Government ruled out takeover bids between water companies and South West is the most vulnerable of the lot.

Or perhaps it wasn't such a good day. because a hostile bid has not been ruled out. but made easier. Ian Lang's bombshell will have given encouragement to bidders outside the industry who might otherwise have feared cosy white knight defences between water companies. South West may claim that a 20 per cent dividend rise next month and a further £15 off household bills next summer has nothing to do with building bid defences, but it will certainly help. South West shares dropped back, but not to below the £5 level they were at before bid activity started in the spring. Since then, the all-share index has risen 6 per cent while South West is at least 15 per cent higher. City analysts are now casting around for potential bidders, such as the French water companies (already prowling the UK water sector) or SWEB, the local electricity company.

One of the oddines of the regulatory system is that SWEB is now better placed than Severn Trent and Wessex. As a non-water utility. SWEB is not one of lan Byatt's blessed comparators and might not be required to make price reductions in return for being allowed to bid. That should leave outsiders able to pay more than water companies. Customers have no reason to thank lan Lang today, but shareholders should suppress their

IN THE media rumour mill, HTV has long been a favourite takeover candidate. But even the reconstructed United News & Media has balked at paying the full price for the Welsh of HTV's earnings this year. Hardly surprising that Carlton Communications chose not to buy the stake and Lord Hollick's United has stopped short of mounting a full takeover - the option was available had he waited until next Friday when this year's Broadcast-

KDAY OCTOBER 26 1996

Caroline Merrell and Marianne Curphey report on the building society flotations

Shares for almost everyone shareholders with stock worth a total of flo billion will swell the ranks of private investors next year. The four building societies poised for flotation will introduce more shareholders to the market than ten years of popular capitalism.

This week, the Halifax Building Society announced further details of the plans for its £10 billion flotation. On average, the nine million members of the society will receive shares valued at around £1,000. Those who have had higher balances in their accounts on the qualifying dates will receive thousands more.

Over the next few weeks the society will be giving its members details of how to ensure they get as much as they can from conversion. The society will be reminding members that they should have at least £100 in their accounts by the end of this year in order to qualify for shares.

Members who qualify for the variable distribution of shares must make sure they top up their accounts to the level they were at on November 25, 1994, by the date of the special general meeting that will decide on the conversion. This is expected to take place at the end of February next year. The building society unticipates that a significant number of new shareholders will sell their shares in a short period of time. The price could move to a premium as the index tracking funds, which include many of the big pension funds, will buy up the shares. In anticipation of this demand, the society has set up a share dealing service which will be free for a limited amount of time after the Dotation

Rob Thomas, UBS analyst, believes that Halifax shares could be a worthwhile long-term bet. In outlining the conversion details, the society also announced it has abandoned its five-year immunity from takenver. Mr Thomas said: "It is unlikely that anyone would be big enough to take over the Halifax, but it is bigger almost than all the other mutuals put together. It is of such a size that it can dictate the price in the mortgage market. It has a relationship with one in five people."

The Halifax has made no secret of the fact that it wants to become a major player in long-term savings.

Mr Thomas said the society could be on the look out to acquire another life insurance company or another society. It has just completed the takeover of the mutual insurer. Clerical Medical Prudential, the mighty life and pensions house which is still believed to be pursuing the Woolwich Building Society, might approach Halifax with the offer of a merger.

The Alliance & Leicester Building Society is anticipating floating at the beginning of next year. Members will next week receive notification of the decide on conversion. This

The Prudential is believed to have held talks with Woolwich about the possibility of takeover before its conversion. Woolwich says it is keen to retain the five years protection. The society has made no secret of the fact that it is keen on making an acquisition. It may buy up another smaller building society or life insurer.

The Northern Rock Build ing Society surprised the market by announcing its conversion plans at the beginning of April this year. The society has around one million members and will have a market capitalisation of El billion. It will hold its special general meeting to vote on conversion

Analysts have no time for failed trusts

NEITHER sentiment nor history will be an adequate defence for poor-performing or obsolete investment trusts. say the authors of the latest investment trust annual published today.

Robin Angus and Hamish Buchan, investment trust analysts at NatWest Securities, say that while the sector has much to offer investors there are examples where the interests of fund managers have with those of shareholders.

The NatWest pair said they wished that "sometimes trust managers and trust boards were not so tenacious in seeking to find methods of survival for their trusts". They add: "For an investment trust there are fates worse than death and one of these is to become a long-term 'problem trust', endeavouring to prove itself in some new way and never quite succeeding".

Nevertheless they predict a bright future for some of the sector's stalwarts.

Those tipped under the "buy" banner include generalist trusts, Foreign & Colonial and Baillie Gifford's Monks. . Under international, Ivory & Sime's British Empire Securities is favoured.

Overseas Kleinwort Charter (Europe), Fleming American and GT Japan are the fancied investment trusts. On the venture capital side Electra and Murray Ventures are to the fore.

Telekom restricts UK investors

Private investors in this country will find it very difficult to participate directly in Europe's biggest ever privatisation.

Deutsche Telekom. the world's third largest telecommunications company, this week unveiled its plans for a pan-European public offering of shares. Investors in the United Kingdom will be offered a 12 per cent stake in the share issue, which is expected to be worth about £! billion. Institutional investors can participate in the issue by contacting one of a number of banks in the United Kingdom. Among them are SBC Warburg, Dresdner, NatWest, Deutsche Morgan Grenfell and Schroder.

The telecoms group is not concentrating its marketing efforts on trying to attract nrivate UK investors, Instead discounts and incentives which have become the hallmark of privatisations in this country, will only be offered to private investors through the German banks. Anyone wanting to apply for shares through this route will have to open a German bank account. Already 3.3 million private investors in Germany have registered an interest in the

Many of the biggest stock-brokers in the United King-dom will be applying for shares through the institution-al placing. They will then be able to pass them on to their private clients. Anyone who buys shares through this route will not be eligible for the discounts enjoyed by other small shareholders. Stockbrokers also point out that there are problems associated with trading in the shares of European companies. Although Deutsche Telekom will be registered on the London Stock Exchange as well as the German and US exchanges, any sale of shares has to go through the European settlement system which can be expensive and could wipe out any gains made.

athew Orr, of Killik & Co. the stockbro-kers, said: "It may well be that you could end up holding a small number of shares where the transaction and custody charges will be very high." One of the other ways of participating in the issue is to invest via a European unit or investment trust which may also be bidding for

For instance, Kleinwort Benson's European Privatisawhich is in the process of being restructured, is plan-

Most analysis agree that Deutsche Telekom shares, like the shares in most of the UK's privatisations, will move to a premium immediately.

The shares are expected to be priced in the range of £10 to ELZ (DM25 to DM30). The unofficial grey market for shares was earlier this week indicating that the price could reach £16. The long-term outlook for the company also looks promising. It has pledged to shed jobs and diversily globally to counter-act the effects of increasing local competition. It, like BT is in the powerful position of owning the network which its rivals will have to lease.

Cucumbers mask real danger

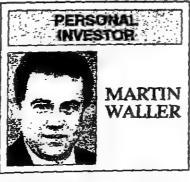

The trouble with Euro-lunacy stories - all those straight cucumbers and the threat to the British banger - is that the true dangers can become submerged under a tide of fiction. One of Britain's most successful business innovations is under threat from the misdirected meddling of the Eurocrats, for reasons that seem to have more to do with well-meaning confusion than any real malice. This has to do with the technical regulations created by the EU to govern company takenvers. Our own rules are hased on market share; if you have more than a quarter of any market, you have to justify any further expansion. On the Continent they do things differently.

The EU looks at the turnover of the rues involved. A complex formula neans if the businesses have combined worldwide sales of five billion ecus, or £3.9 billion, and two or more have combined sales of 250 million ecus in Europe, the deal must be taken to the Commission a riresome and prolonged business because there is an automatic suspension period of at least three weeks.

It gives rise to what the lawyers call the Sandwich Bar Syndrome. If, say, Siemens and Deutsche Telekom, two of Germany's biggest companies, should chouse between them to buy a sandwich har on Bondi Beach, they must first clear it with Brussels even if it has no implications for competition in any market. Daft, but those are the rules. One of the outstanding successes of the past 15 years has been the British venture capital industry. Firms such as 3i. Schroders, the Prudential, Electra and others, often but not always controlled and funded by the big banks or insurers, have provided capital to huge numbers of small businesses denied it by other routes, in exchange for a stake. As it happens Europe is as ripe for reconstruction as British business was two decades ago, with masses of small, under-funded, often family companies. British fund managers are increasingly exporting their skills there. But they are being badly hampered by the Euro-legislation on takeovers, because of the way this is interpreted. When assessing turnover, Brussels includes that of associates in which the party has a controlling investment or that have control of that party. This is to get around those complex cross-holdings so common on the Continent, where company A has a chunk of bank B which owns a bit of manufacturer C and so on, allowing all to present a united front to the outside world. Fair enough; but venture capitalists always take a holding in their charges. The Eurocrats insist on counting the turnovers of those companies in which venture capitalists hold stakes, and the turnovers of those banks or insurers that own the venture capitalists. This means almost everyone gets caught in the net.

Two venture groups, acting together as they often do, cannot help the owner of a sandwich bar in Clapham High Street to expand without going to Brussels to ask permission first. Never mind that neither has any holding in another sandwich bar anywhere - the EU rules are all about turnover, remember, not competition.

Tenture capitalists have to move fast, if they are invited to put a V new management into a business or support the old one. There is often an auction by the vendor, for example. They cannot be bothered with filling in a form and waiting around for the deal to be waved through by Brussels. The result is that they are having to get around these wholly unnecessary restrictions by various artificial means. The situation can only get worse, because Brussels is pushing to drop those turnover thresholds that trigger interference to three fifths of their current levels. John Bridgeman, head of the Office of Fair Trading, is fighting a gallant rearguard action — he was on the stump again in Berlin this week warning of the "unpleasant side effects" of reducing those thresholds. But there is no certainty he will succeed.

The flat was bought at the height of the property boom in 1988 and it is now worth considerably less than the mort-gage. Selling it is not an option. However, as it is such a nice flat and has just been refurbished and redecorated, we assumed that, so long as we were asking a realistic rent, we would have no difficulty letting it. At first, it seemed it was going to be ridiculously

However, on the appointed day, instead of receiving a signed contract, we got a curt typewritten note from one saying that, as her friend had no guarantee of getting a job (something we had all known from the outset) she had suddenly decided to stay in Singapore with her family rather than come back to London. Next up were two designers. They also loved the flat and were very keen. References were provided. They wanted to move in two weeks. We arranged a meeting. They seemed very nice and just when we thought we'd covered everything, one of them mentioned that they wanted to

He'd need to be: two burly removal men had struggled to up-end the sofabed to get it through the door. Somehow we doubted her and her boyfriend's ability to perform a similar exercise. Buying or selling a house is widely recognised as one of life's most stressful events beaten only by bereavement and divorce. If our experience is anything to go by, letting a flat isn't far behind. We do not currently have any choice about being landlords but anyone voluntarily embarking on such a course would be wise to do it with his eyes open. Apart from the frustration involved, finding tenants is time-consuming (particularly if you don't use agents to do the initial screening and chase the references) - something anyone (like us) working full time and with family commitments, should bear in mind. It may also take longer than you think to find suitable tenants. Even a delay of a few weeks in getting rental income may throw out the

Bristol apology for months of delay

Sara McConnell reports on a couple who almost lost a new home through a tardy lender

A couple whose mortgage application took Bristol & West four months to process are demanding compensation from the society and lodging a formal complaint. Clare Dryland and Antony Harrington, first-time buyers from north London, say Bristol & West's delays nearly cost them their new Bat.

Ms Dryland and Mr Harrington contacted Weekend Money after revelations last weekend that some lenders were taking months to process mortgage applications. Royal Bank of Scotland agreed to pay £450 compensation to a couple who had faced a twomonth delay, after the intervention of The Times.

B&W claimed it had overcome earlier delays in the summer by training extra staff and allocating more resources to turning around applications. It promised a 14-day turnaround in most cases.

But it took Ms Dryland and Mr Harrington from June 2 to October 9 to receive a formal mortgage offer. The couple are buying a one-bedroom flat in north London for £90,000. They wanted a loan of £80,000 and chose Bristol & West because it had a competitive firsttime buyer five-year fixed rate. Delays started in the first month when B&W objected to the couple's solicitor on the ground that he was a sole practitioner and therefore unacceptable to carry out the society's legal work. Mr Harrington and Ms Dryland had to pay him off and start again with a new solicitor. Bristol & West was unable to explain why it did not make any objection at the beginning.

It took two months for the survey to be completed, in-cluding special reports de-manded on the new flat by the surveyor. The flat was valued at only £85,000 which meant the couple were borrowing a larger amount of the property's value.

This made them incligible for the original fixed rate of 6.95 per cent until 2001 which had first attracted them. B&W said there were "problems" with the property but could not explain satisfactorily why the survey and reports took so long.

Credit checks on the couple did not start until the beginning of September. The society Weekend Money that there was a seven-day delay because it was behind with its administration and so could not meet its 48-hour target turneround time. But blamed a further three-week wait until October 9 on the couple's own circumstances, saying the case was "compli-cated" because Mr Harrington was self-employed, which he has been for five years.

Mr Harrington was forced to supply extra documentation because his accounting year had ended in June. B&W agreed it had other self-employed customers but could not confirm whether it had stardard procedures for dealing with the self-employed.

The formal offer finally went out on October 9, Ms Dryland said: "My overall impression is of incompetence and a lackiustre approach. We supplied all the bank statements and everything they wanted. Julie Clifford of AJ Buckley, a financial adviser of Godalming, Surrey, who handled their mortgage applica-tion, said: This should have been straightforward but it was incredibly slow. B&W kept coming back piecemeal for more information. It was not making any effort, very much passing the buck from the branch to head office."

B&W apologised for the delay but declined to commit itself to compensation without going through its internal

The Virgin Personal Pension, as inspired by Andy Fairweather Low.

W 7ith many pension companies, you are expected to decide today what you will be doing and how you Bend will be living for the next thirty years.

But life is unpredictable.

Things change. We take new jobs, buy and sell houses, marry, have children. Many of us sadly get divorced. You may inherit money, or get ill.

For a hundred quite different reasons over the years, you may wish to increase or decrease the amount you save.

Many pension plans advertised as 'flexible', allow you to do this, but charge you through the nose for the privilege. Some penalise you even if you want to increase your payments. It's a bit like a bank advertising free banking and then charging you if a cheque bounces.

Such advertising is just to lure you in.

For years the pension industry has got away with not telling you how much of your money they cream off in charges.

Today we have the Financial Services Act which forces them to tell you. But there is a loophole. The company is entitled to assume that you will stick rigidly to your initial arrangements. If you alter them, you get nailed with charges.

Virgin Direct refuses to do this. Our personal pension is ultra-flexible.

You can stop, start, increase or decrease the amount you save and you won't have to pay a penalty for doing so.

We contact you once a year to ask if there's anything that you want or need to change. No wonder the industry is in an uproar. Just imagine - a pension company that treats you as if it's your money and your life. Whatever next?

If you'd like to know more about the Virgin Personal Pension, do give us a call. Tell us how much you want to tuck away each month. We'll send you a

If you have some spare cash and want to capitalise on your professional or managerial skills you can provide seed capital for small businesses with innovative products. There are substantial tax benefits under the Government's Enterprise Investment Scheme: angels who retain their company shares for at least five years are exempt from capital gains tax (CGT). Also, 20 per cent of the sum angels invest is deductible from their income tax liability, and should an angel suffer a loss selling his stake he can choose to offset it against income tax or CGT. However, small businesses are vulnerable to cashflow problems, changes in the market and rising interest rates. It is a risky investment so do not rely on it for your future. Keep most of your savings in safer — and more liquid — form, Patrick Dunne, a director at

He has no background in toys "but I have children and we've all been kids".

Are you leaving your heirs less tax more inheritance?

Naturally you want to leave all of your estate to your family or dependants or at least to someone of your choosing.

But the truth is that without some forward planning your heirs will receive only what is left after the Inland Revenue take their share in the form of Inberitance Tax when you die.

And that share can be quite dramatic.

For example, on an estate of £600,000 (including house, contents, personal effects, stocks and shares, bonds, trusts, cash, life assurance and any inheritances) the Exchequer stands to be an equal beneficiary. If there were three children each would receive almost £150,000 but the Exchequer would take £160,000.

And it gets worse; above £200,000 the rate is a flat 40%. At Towry Law we can help you make plans to reduce your liability and

In addition, earnings growth is slowing down and some believe the recent pace set by shares is unlikely to continue.

The US election may have a temporary effect on market sentiment — when Clinton was elected for the first time four years ago the Standard & Poor's 500 index, which tracks the top 500 US companies, fell from 43i to 416 in six months. Historically, the stock mar-ket stays flat or falls slightly

The biggest investors in United States companies are the mutual funds, which manage pensions on behalf of millions of investors. This money is expected to continue to pour into the market, as the baby-boom generation, those aged 30 to 40, begins seriously to plan for retirement over the next 30 years.

Even if the mutual funds decided they could make more money for their clients by investing incoming money in another country, any such move is likely to be temporary. It is also highly unlikely that the money already invested in US stocks by the mutual funds would switch out.

Mr Denham said: "The flow of this money may slow down, if better value is to be found by investing in other markets overseas, but it will not be switched off."

Teacher learns how to plan for a happier retirement

anielle Williams left her Weekend Money Financial Fitness Test more than £500 better off than when she arrived. Ms Williams is in her mid-40s and newly divorced. Although her two children are grown up, she was advised that she was still eligible to claim the single parent allowance from the Inland Revenue for the two years since her decree nisi because her 20-year-old daughter is in full-time decree.

It remained to be seen whether Vivienne Starkey from Haddock Porter & Partners, the independent adviser conducting the money makeover, could perform similar magic in other areas of Ms Williams's finances.

Ms Williams's main concern is to find a suitable vehicle for her money to maximise provision for her retirement. She was aware, however, that she had left it rather late to start putting money into a pension. What other options might be available? "Pensions are something that have never interested me in the past," she said, Ms Williams is a school teachers' final salary pension scheme in September 1994. She currently puts £95 of her net monthly salary of £1.075 into the scheme — but was not sure whether it is money well spent. She owns a property in the South East of England worth about £80,000 on which there is no mortgage, and has a £40,000 lump sum as part of her divorce settlement. She used to plan for retirement?

Ms Williams is a school teacher, but only joined the

"I'm not interested in pension planning because at my age it's not really worthwhile, according to what I've seen," she says. At the moment, her teacher's pension is on target to provide an income of about £3,000 a year. Given this, she said: "I think I'd rather just spend the money."

so how could this lump sum be

Ms Starkey said she was perhaps being a little too quick to dismiss an income of this amount. "What's the state pension? Around £3,000 a year. So already you've doubled your annual retirement income," she said. And, although small, the pension will keep its buying power because it is indexlinked, she added, "You could he retired an awfully long time." This. Ms Williams doubted, which was another reason why she was not keen on a pension. "Most teachers die a year or so after retirement. I would want my children to be able to inherit," she said. She was also loathe to commit any more of her into be costed. These were: buying "extra years" in the teachers' scheme (which would put her in a similar position to someone who had been paying in for a longer period): making an additional voluntary contribution into the teachers' scheme (which is run by the Prudential); making a free-

been married for 25 years and restricted myself, I don't want to have to scrime now."

Ms Starkey agreed there should be a balance between having enough money now to enjoy a reasonable lifestyle and planning ahead. "Who wants to be the richest person in the graveyard?" If Ms Williams raised her pension provision, there were three possible routes standing additional voluntary contribution. Or she could do nothing. "You may well decide to do nothing, but you should look at all the options and make an informed decision,"

So what other possibilities were there for Ms Williams's E40,000? Much would depend on her attitude to risk, "I'd like high income and no risk," she said simply — something to which all investors aspire. However, Ms Williams knows first hand that the value of investments can go down as well as up. Although she and her husband made some successful investments during their married life, they made other decisions which fared less well. "I have lost capital on a couple of occasions, It's made me more cautious," she said.

With this in mind, Ms Starkey recommended dividing her lump sum into three tranches. The first should continue to be kept in a building society, in case of emergencies.

Ms Williams reckoned she would need about £10,000 instantly available to be able to sleep easily. The second tranche should be invested where it would work harder for her, but still be available quickly if needed. Ms Starkey suggested putting the maximum annual allowance into a

So long as she does not touch the capital for five years, this would pay her a tax-free return of around 7 per cent. The final tranche of money should be ear-marked for the longer term. For this, Ms Starkey suggested a regular premium Pep which, again, would be tax-free. Unit trusts or other forms of collective investments might also be worth considering, she said.

Assuming an annual Pep return of 9 per cent gross, by age 60 Ms Williams's entire portfolio, including her teacher's pension, could generate a retirement income of nearly 50 per cent of her final salary. Ms Starkey calculated. Not a fortune, but hopefully enough to live on reasonably comfortably.

However, Ms Starkey added a proviso. "Do not rush into anything. Anyone who has just been through the upheaval of divorce (even if they have left it late to plan for their retirement) should wait before tying up their money for any length of time. A career change, followed by a divorce, followed by buying and refurnishing a flat is probably enough for Ms williams to be getting on with

Williams to be getting on with.

Drawbacks of a Bill designed to reform leasehold

POTENTIAL flatowners retuctant to buy leasehold property in case of difficulties with unscrupulous landlords and high service charges may be able to buy their flats freehold under a new system of commonhold ownership.

The Commonhold Bill, which received the parliamentary go-ahead in this week's Queen's Speech, would allow individuals in blocks of flats to become freehold owners in their own right. They would collectively be responsible for repairs, maintenance and insurance through a commonhold association. Their rights and responsibilities would be set out in a simple standard document, rather than an often complex lease.

The Government sees commonhold as a way of overcoming well-publicised problems with the leasehold system. Flatowners already have the right collectively to buy the freehold of their block. But even if they do this, they are still bound by the terms of their lease and have to set up a separate legal company to own the freehold. Leases would not exist in a commonhold system.

But campaigners for lease-hold reform give warning that flatowners risk losing many of their hard-earned rights if the Bill goes through Parliament as it stands. The rules allowing existing leaseholders to convert to commonhold are also so cumbersome that few will be tempted to go through the process.

Under the Bill:

You will only be able to convert to commonhold as an existing leaseholder if you first collectively buy your freehold.

■ If you do decide to convert to commonhold you will not be covered by any of the new leaseholders' rights enshrined in the 1996 Housing Act. These include the right to challenge service charges at a Leasehold Valuation Tribunal and the right to have charges ruled as reasonable by an LVT before facing the threat of losing your home.

■ There is no independent disputes procedure as there is in other countries where commonhold operates. Your only recourse as an individual against fellow freeholders will be through the courts.

If your fellow flattowners will have the right to enter your home on a number of pretexts without a court order or right of appeal.

Fight for bonuses continues

ampaigners fighting for the rights of dis-abled and elderly people excluded from bonuses from building society conversions are keeping up the pressure on ministers and the building societies ombudsman for a change in the pulse. for a change in the rules.

This week political expedi-ency temporarily dashed campaigners' hopes as legislation designed to overcome the exclusions was dropped from the Queen's Speech.

The new draft Building Societies Bill would have allowed anyone named on an account to qualify for a bonus, not just the first named. The Bill may be resurrected after the general election but would almost certainly come too late for excluded members of societies which have already announced schemes, including the Halifax, the Alliance & Leicester, the Woolwich and the Northern Rock.

In August The Times exposed the plight of residents in nursing homes, hospitals and hostels who are unable to operate their own building society accounts. The account has to be in the name of a member of hostel or hospital staff with the resident as the second named. Under current rules governing conversion bonuses, only the first named qualifies for a payout of free shares or cash.

Many staff members in hospitals and hostels are the first named on residents' accounts but they only qualify for one payout, based on the total of the sums in all the accounts. If they hold an account in their own name, they have to decide whether to take the bonus on their own account or on those of residents. If staff change and the account is closed and reopened in the name of a new member of staff, the bonus is lost because the account has not been open continuously.

Hazel Ward and her handicapped son, Matthew, who is set to lose out on bonuses

Societies claim they are bound by the law and that they have to stick to the parameters set when deciding who gets a bonus. David Gilchrist, general manager of the Halifax, said: "We are not discriminating against the disabled. Under current building society law you have to name a member for a payout,"

But there are clear signs that the campaign for the rights of disabled building society members has the sympathy of ministers and the ombudsman and that pressure will continue for a change in the law.

Tom Clarke, Shadow Minister for the Disabled, is planning to set down a parliamentary question on the issue in the next few weeks, after correspondence with Ray Ward, a Weekend Money reader. Mr Ward's disabled son. Matthew, is set to lose out on bonuses from his Halifax and Alliance & Leicester accounts because he is not the first named member.

Mr Ward has campaigned unceasingly in the media for changes. Pam Hannam, honorary secretary of Bristol Mencap, another active camigner, has set up a meeting th William Waldegrave, sury and MP for the Clifton constituency in Bristol.

Brian Murphy, the building societies ombudsman, is reviewing a number of cases relating to the Halilax payout to see if his interpretation of the present rules differs from that of the Halifax, But he confesses that his powers are limited. In a letter to Ms Hannam, he says: The ombudsman can only consider complaints that relate to the operation or termination of an account. This means he cannot question the terms of any change in a society's business status including the terms on which honuses become payable under any such change in

The fall of the Building Societies Bill will mean Mr Murphy will be constrained by the existing law limiting payouts to first named mem bers. The proposed Bill would have dramatically extended his powers and the rights of second named account holders but would still not have included powers to intervene in disputes over hile interest rates re-main low, the num-ber of notice ounts which appear to offer juicier rates of interest has grown. But while acknowledging savers' concerns about where interest rates are going and their subsequent desire for short-term accounts, building societies have been bending the rules somewhat. Take the latest savers' account launched this week by the West Bromwich "for smaller investors". The 30 Day Savings Account, boasts the society, combines "competitive rates of interest - up - with penalty-free instant access to funds". That is not quite accurate. There is penalty-free instant access to funds but only twice a year (ap to £250 in cash or £50,000 by cheque). After that any withdrawals are subject to the loss of 30 days' interest.

Traditionally numbered day accounts would indicate the notice period you need to give to make a withdrawal. Increasingly, though, societies are taking the line that the number of days is the amount savers lose in interest if they make a withdrawal. The society is writing to account holders to explain that they can now at least close their Postal 60 account without penalty, as long as they give 60 days' notice in writing. "It used to be that, the longer the notice period, the better the rate. High-flyers targeted

atWest Bank has denied that the launch of its £150-a-year current account signals the end of free

Its Advantage Premier account is aimed at "busy high-flyers" earning more than E25,000 a year and follows similar moves by Barclays and Royal Bank of Scotland to offer packaged bank accounts. NatWest hopes to attract 100,000 new and existing omers to the service. For the present it is also continuing to run a £85-a-year Gold Plus service for high earners.

The majority of current accounts in the UK are still free for customers who remain in credit. However, a recent survey predicted that banks were likely to abandon the concept of free banking in the future and instead offer customers a paid-for bank account with free medical and travel insurance thrown in.

NatWest said this week that, although borrowers were subsidising current account holders by paying higher than sary interest rates, free banking was still extremely popular in the UK. David McLean, head of personal banking, said: We have no plans at present to end free banking.

Despite the millions of pounds spent on advertising, banks concede privately that there is little to distinguish one current account from another.

Paid-for accounts with extra "lifestyle" benefits are seen as a more effective way of branding. After months of testing, Barelays has just rolled its Additions count out nationally. For a charge of £60 a year. Barclays customers receive free overdraft, life cover, and medical insurance. The Royal Bank of Scotland. meanwhile, has been promoting "Royalties", a packaged account launched in April which now has over 85,000 customers. For £4 a month, accountholders get preferential overdraft and personal loan rates. I per cent bonus on lump sum investments and pensions, £100 discount on mortgage arrangement lees and some travel benefits.

This, say observers, is the future of banking. Those customers who pay for a packaged account will be rewarded with a better service and incentives, perhaps in the form of higher interest rates, to buy long-term savings vehicles such as personal equity plans and Tessas (tax-exempt special savings

Meanwhile, Midland Bank and Abbey National say they have no plans for making charges on accounts in credit.

A spokesman for Midland said: "There are not enough people who want to pay for a current account service. In the late 1980s we had a Vector account aimed at people who had a lot of money and wanted the facility for a high-value cheque card and a large overdraft. We scrapped that when times moved on and we do not believe that charging will work now. Instead, we believe the way to keep customers is to offer them loyalty

packages and favourable investment

NatWest's Advantage Premier offers the services of a personal banking manager, a gold MasterCard chargecard with Air Miles, complimentary multi-trip travel insurance and commission-free travel money, and discounts on theatre tickets and dining out.

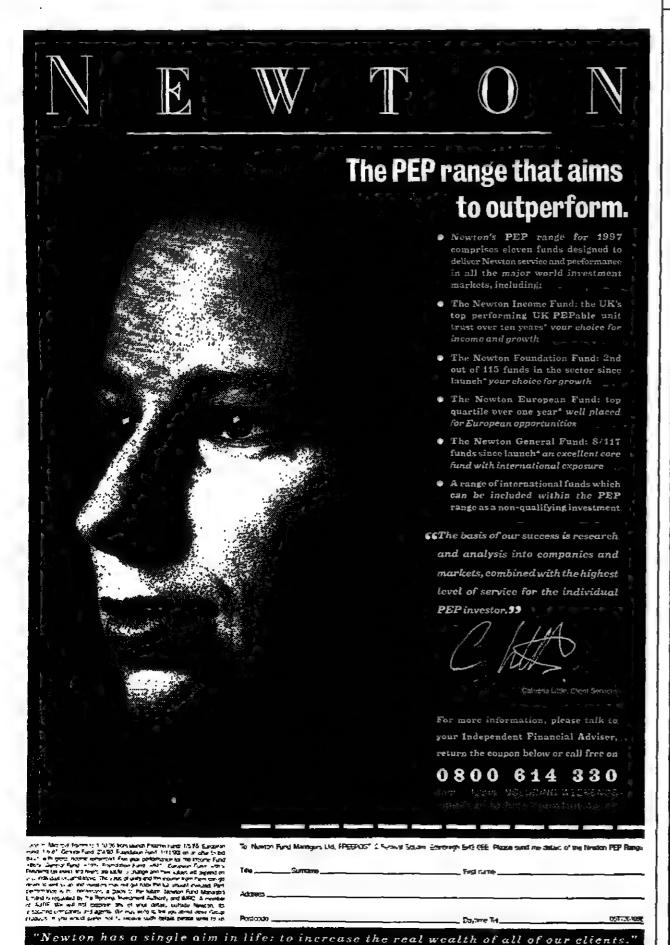

NatWest said its research showed that people would be willing to pay the £150 charge in return for the extra features.

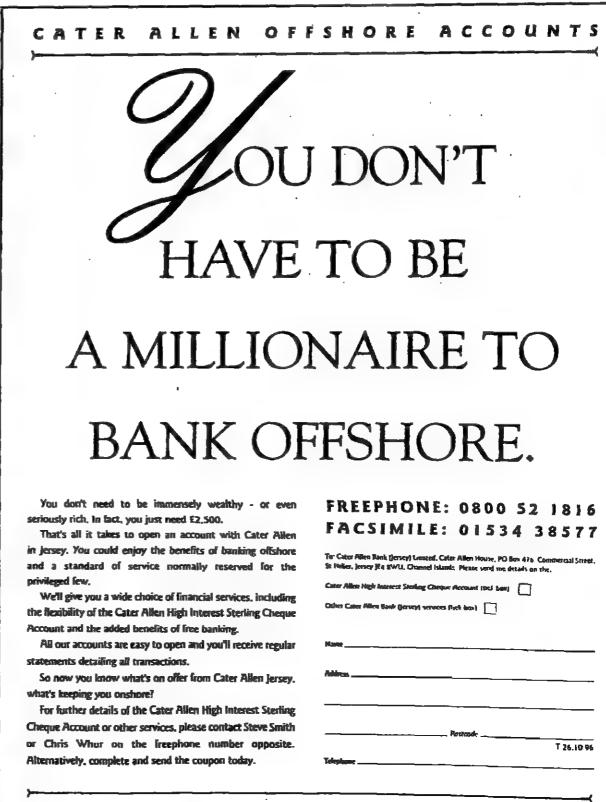

It intends to introduce further paid-for accounts next year. One will cost around £80 annually and will be aimed at around 2.5 million customers who do not fit into the Advantage category but who want extra services. Other accounts will target young graduates and the over-50s. NatWest has also been criticised for closing branches and transferring customer inquiries to new service centres (see Letters, page 39). Mr McLean said if towns had more than one branch then rationalisation" did take place, but he said branches were being replaced by telephone, personal computer and television banking.

He denied that people who did not pay for their current account would receive an inferior service. He said the Advantage Premier service was providing an extra tier of service for people who wanted a closer relationship with their bank manager.

Adam Jones says timing is vital when entering the gilts market

t is traditional to become obsessed with interest rates and inflation before an election. Investors in gilts have more reason than most to punder these two economic benchmarks. Gilts are stocks issued and backed by the Government. They owe their name to the gilt edging on the paper that records their issue, mark of the superior credit quality that makes them one of oday's safest investments.

Essentially, buyers of gilts are loaning the Treasury money. For the use of their capital, they are paid a fixed amount of interest over two dates each year until the loan reaches the end of its life and the Government repays the original sum of money.

Different gilts will pay different rates of annual interest. derwise known as coupons. The coupon will be determined by economic conditions at the time of issue. For instance, gilts paying 7 per cent until 2001 were issued early last week in a heavily over-subscribed auction.

The rates will generally be less than those for bonds issued simultaneously by companies, which have a lower credit rating — the security of gov-ernment-backed debt comes at a price. They also have different lifespans, typically up to 25 years. It is these two variable factors — the rate of interest and the time left to run - that create a secondary market where gilts can be bought and sold "second-hand" as opposed to fresh at issue.

A gilt will be attractive to a "second-hand" buyer if it pays more than the prevailing base rate of interest. This will be reflected in the price.

Gilt prices can be found in Times financial pages daily. They are expressed as if you were buying a bundle of gilts that would have cost EIOO at issue. If the fixed rate is good compared with the current base rate, it will cost you more than £100 to buy, even though interest will only be paid on that nominal £100.

For instance the price quoted for Treasury 9 per cent 2008 gilts — which give a 9 per cent return until the year 2008 – was about £110 last week. The extra £10 pays for the favourable interest rate. When the gilt is redeemed, you get

Prices will also be influenced by the amount of time left to run. Gilts are classified as either "shorts" (under five years to run), "mediums" (5 to years) or "longs" (over 15 years). As the redemption date gets close, the traded value will fall until it reaches £100. The longer you have to run the better. Other gilt information is vital. The yield is a percentage that tells you how much return you get on your capital during the gilt's life, but this cannot take into account how the value of the lump sum

when you sell. But there is a long-term yield quoted. The gross redemption yield will tell you the percentage return if you hold the gilt until the end

liquidated by the Government.

At the moment, gross redemption yields vary between about 6 and 8 per cent. They are yields, which range from about capital element. The big danger of buying gilts — or any fixed-investment that keeps hold of your money - is that inflation will eat into the real value of the locked-in capital. Add that to the possible anxieties presented by changing interest rates and it becomes clear that timing is vital for gilt purchase. One solution is to buy index-linked gilts, where the interest rate and the repayment value will rise in line with inflation. The income will be lower but Stephen Lewis of the London Bond Broking Company sees them as a useful hedging tool before the election. Investors could consider efficient. All interest will be are free of capital gains tax. Charges must also be considered, though they are small compared with managed funds. Buying through the National Savings Stock Register using forms held at the Post Office is one approach, although an execution-only service is provided, meaning you cannot get advice on what to buy. It will cost 0.7 per cent on the first £5,000 and 0.375 per cent on the next £5,000; the minimum charge is £12.50.

Stockbrokers and independent financial advisers will generally set a higher minimum, say £20-£40, and a higher percentage commission, about 0.5 per cent to 1.5 per cent. But they will be able to offer advice on what securities are suitable.

Two other special types of gilt are undated gilts, which have no fixed repayment date and are, in theory, indefinite and stripped gilts which are set to become the most sophisticated form of gilt-edged investment. Planned for 1997, they will split all the halfyearly interest payments and the final capital payment into individually sold packets. This will give investors the chance to mix and match their gilt holdings, creating a more flexible instrument, able to pay out more when you need the money and vice versa.

From Mr R. A. Smethurst Sir. Like your correspondent Mrs Riley (Banking on a fall in service standards, Weekend Money Letters, October 12), I tal received a questionnaire from NatWesi Bank about branch service standards. One question asked whether my branch answered the telephone within three rings. I was pleased to answer in the affirmative.

More recently. I was advised that a new Service Centre had been opened for my branch. By ringing the centre any query would be answered much more efficiently. The other day I needed to make an account inquiry. Preferring my branch (and the very helpful staff there) to handle it, I rang the branch number but was told by prerecorded message that the number had changed. The new number turned out to be the Service Centre located more than 15 miles away. Imagine my amazement when a stacking system placed me in a queue and blayed soothing music at my expense until a clerk was available. Is this supposed to

I thought that this kind of faceless service was reserved for volume operators, for example utilities, not for a leading financial institution whose interest rates and tariffs always include a loading for quality service. For example, I was recently advised in a account. The Service Centre told me that the stacking system was about to be removed due to the volume of complaints - what does NatWest expect? When I asked how telephone calls would be answered in future, the reply was the telephones "will just be left to ring".

Mrs Riley, you are right about falling standards in NatWest. But we must not blame the branch staff. They

From Mrs E.A. Daulby

Sir, It was with a mixture of sadness and relief that I read Mrs L.M. Riley's letter concerning NatWest Bank. As an employee of NatWest for 20 years, I felt great sadness that customers feel that the service offered by the bank has deteriorated to such an extent but I also felt a great sense of relief to find that customers recognise that the standards experienced are not the responsibility of the staff on the ground, Mrs Riley is quite correct when she states that staffing has been cut to the bone, and is likely to be cut further, massive amounts of unpaid stall on the ground face constant complaints and are back-ed by what the bank has freely admitted is very poor quality technology. Mrs Riley might be interested to learn that customer complaints are no longer immediately referred to the Regional Office, who would look into the matter and liaise directly with the customer, but by the branch concerned. This has now put the branch staff apologising and trying to justi-fy decisions that are not made by them.

Mrs Riley might also be interested to know that share-holders are treated in a better manner than the staff. The dividend has never been cut. yet this year we face a cut in our profit sharing which has been paid ever since I joined the bank.

Mrs Riley might also like to ponder upon the fact that many of our new NatWest colleagues who have joined us from Hambro Magan will be paid massive "golden hand-cuff" payments for the honour of keeping a job which is already well paid in terms of annual salary and enormous bonus payments. Staff in my office face certain redundancy, one of my colleagues who has worked for NatWest for 10 years and has an unblemished service record will be paid £3.100 redundancy and I will receive approximately £16.000

after 20 years. Try the Alliance & Leicester Mrs Riley. My husband uses them for all his household accounts and savings. They have only ever once, in three years, made a mistake with a standing order and they sorted it out immediately and paid E25 compensation for their

No accounting for the societies' errors

From Mr D.M. Hon Sir, In the last few years, 1 have received letters of apology from leading building societies apologising for errors, never in my favour, of interest on my account.

The most typical excuses I received were: a) The problems encountered in merging the computer systerns of two societies. b) We wrongly added your interest to the name next to yours on our computer list.

corrected after I wrote to the society. God knows how many thousands of other investors are unknowingly losing out. 1 also felt frustrated when information given at the local branch is contradicted by rechecking with head office. Thanks for your excellent personal finance articles. Who needs financial advisers! Yours faithfully, DONALD ILOTT, 35 Altwood Road, Maidenhead,

Wiki seals series win as Britain fall short

RUGBY LEAGUE

Great Britain

FROM CHRISTOPHER IRVINE IN PALMERSTON NORTH

FOR all the bravery and commitment shown by Great Britain, New Zealand's first series victory since 1984 narrowed down to an edge in quality and a high-class centre whose name is an anagram of Kiwi, Ruben Wiki's two splenmain difference in another dramatic, see-sawing encounter here yesterday.

Britain lacked experience and reached the limit of their youthful potential. The margin was slender, the outcome in doubt until the end, yet the better side prevailed. Although disappointed, Phil Larder was not downbeat. "This is a very fine New Zealand side." the Britain coach said. "It wasn't for want of effort that we lost. It hurts, but we're up for the last match at Christchurch next week."

It is easy to imagine that Britain's missing talent might have made the difference. But New Zealand had similar problems and possessed sufficient calibre to turn round a 13-8 half-time deficit.

Unlike the first match, both sets of backs had room to breathe, with New Zealand always the more dangerous. Wiki was brought into the starting line-up ahead of Blackmore, mainly to shore up the defence, but his attacking prowess, in harness with Timu, in the centre, was immense. At half back, Ngamu and Jones finally demonstrated what an exciting combination they are.

Although Harris made his most telling contribution of the tour, the one genuine game-breaker Britain had was Goulding, whose kicking game was a mixed bag. The real damage was done in the first half by the forward axis of Farrell and Betts, who created the opening try by Hunte. the back-row pair with smothering tactics in the second half. Britain's attack became hopelessly constrained.

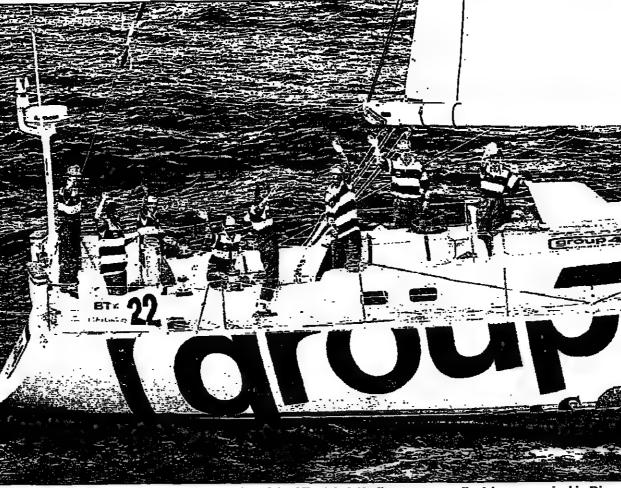

Goulding built on Hunte's try with a dropped goal, before a lost ball by Hunte gave New Zealand the position from which Timu stepped outside Powell and supplied Wiki with his first try. Ridge added the conversion to an earlier penalty, but Betts quickly put Britain back in control after Spruce had spun and fought his way through a thicket of

Apart from a third goal by Goulding, New Zealand, spearheaded in the secondrow by the driving, off-loading force of Kearney. always looked like securing victory after the break. Hoppe had fumbled a scoring chance in the opening minutes, but there were no more mistakes once Kearney put away Wiki, who eluded Spruce and held off Goulding over 40 metres.

Spruce did exceptionally well to hold up Jones iл another sortle, but cracks in Britain's defence and the fact that the big Kiwi forwards were now riding their counterparts' tackles told with 15 minutes left. Ngamu tracked down the blind side off a scrum for a copybook score that was to prove decisive.

NEW ZEALAND: M Ridge (Auckland); Hoppe (Auckland), R Wiki (Canberra).

FROM EDWARD GORMAN EALING COMPESSIONDENT IN RIO DE JANEIRO

TO THE boys playing foot-ball on the beach, the 67-foot cutter with Group 4 written in large black letters on her side was hardly worth a second look, as it rolled gently up to the finish line off Forte de Copacabana yesterday under a fragile masthead spinnaker. On board Mike Golding's yacht and among the handfuls of well-wishers from Britain watching from the shore or on spectator boats, though, there was huge excitement as she finally claimed the prize of being first into Rio in the BT Global Challenge. She also set a race record for the leg, almost exactly three days faster than British Steel U four years ago. Her final run-in was not without incident however. With less than a quarter of a mile to go to the line, the spinnaker blew out at the head in about 12 knots of breeze. Golding and his crew took three minutes to get what remained of it down and get a jib flying. Two minutes later, a staysail was also bending to the wind for the last few hundred yards to the gun. Braves facing formidable *

test of courage

FROM KEITH BLACKMORE IN ATLANTA

THE streets of New York will be deserted and the bars packed tonight when the New York Yankees return to their home in the Bronx with a chance to clinch their first World Series championship for 18 years.

The Yankees gave themselves that chance when they beat the Atlanta Braves 1-0 in game five here on Thursday night to take a 3-2 lead in the best-of-seven series. The result continued a remarkable transformation. After losing the first two games at home last weekend, the Yankees left town with the strident views of their fans and New York's ferocious media ringing in

By winning all three games in Atlanta, the Yankees have turned those howls of scorn to roars of approval and Yankee Stadium is likely to live up to one of its better nicknames. The Bronx Zoo, when it is crammed with nearly 60.000 lucky ticket-holders tonight.

Atlanta, the 1995 champions, now face the most intimidating of tasks: they must win the two remaining games in New York if they are to keep their crown. The environment could hardly be more hostile: the Zoo in full cry is like Anfield, St James' Park and Elland Road rolled into one.

The Braves will take comfort from two things: no-one in this series has managed to win a home game, equalling a record set in 1906, and tonight they will play behind the greatest pitcher of the modern era, Greg Maddux, who won game two in the same, intimidating, surroundings.

Even Maddux may not save them now, though. Their re-cent success — four National League pennants, one World Series championship, all since 1991 — has been built on one of basebail's unchallenged tenets: that good pitching beats good hitting. They have had good pitching for each of the last three games and lost.

The latest defeat was heartbreaking for their starter. John Smoltz, who had won 29 games this season. His performance was almost immaculate. A single, uncharacteristic fielding error by Marquis Grissom allowed Cecil Fielder to drive in the decisve run in the fourth inning. Smoltz actually gave up only four hits, one fewer than his opposite STATE OF THE STATE

number. Andy Pettitte. By any standards, the Braves are one of the best baseball teams of modern times but to bear any comparison with the truly great teams they need a second championship. Even their claim to be the "team of the Nineties" over looks the fact that the Toronto Blue Jays have won two championships in the decade.

The World Series is such a wonderful championship precisely because it probes every area of a team's strength and weakness. No flaw can be long concealed. After their dazzling victories in the first two games, the Braves seemed nvincible. Their pitching has lived up to the loftiest of expectations but it is increasingly clear that their hitting is not strong enough. After the firestorm of scoring in game one the batters have struggled to create as much as a spark.

Worse, their standards in the field seem to have slipped. Fielding errors contributed to each of the last two defeats. Much was made of the lact that their starting line-up in game one contained five players under the age of 25, but inexperience has started to peek through.

Next season they move next door to the converted Olympic Stadium and the Braves managed only a sad farewell to the scene of all their recent triumphs, Atlanta Fulton County Stadium, which is to be turned into a car park for the new ballpark. Nostalgia for the old place was diluted by the fact that it was only 30 years old. Obsolescence travels fast in these parts, as the Braves may be about to discover

Europe's elite get down to more serious business

By David Hands, rugby correspondent

IF IT had not been so before, the Heineken Cup becomes very serious today: after three rounds, the shape of the likely quarter-finals is becoming clearer, with home advantage going to the respective poolwinners. That means not only home support but the possibility of substantial gate receipts to bolster clubs eager to improve their cashflow.

This is scarcely a romantic view of European competition this season, but it is a realistic one: one of the many points of difference between the English Professional Rugby Union Clubs and the Rugby Football Union, for example, is that the union's entitlement of £160,000 from the 1995-96 Heineken Cup has yet to be distributed to the clubs and, if the RFU gets its way, it will not be, but will instead go towards setting up the new management company that will run professional

the cost of their failure to win either of their European games thus far. There remains a mathematical chance of progress but, since today's visitors to Loftus Road are Toulouse, the holders, it is a slim one. The London club had been looking forward to receipts of around £125,000 had they managed a home tie on November 16, but there must be some extravangant changes in form in pool D if they are to save their bacon. Wasps have dropped Gar-eth Rees, their leading points-scorer, retaining Jon Ufion at full back and restoring Alex King in place of Rees at standoff half after his shoulder injury. They hope to bolster their set-piece work by giving Andy Reed his debut at lock and Lawrence Dallaglio moves to the blind-side flank. However, with Cardiff the likely winners over Milan tomorrow, despite the absence through injury of Jonathan

Lomu confirmed as certainty for tour

SPECULATION that Jonah Lomu will pull out of the New Zealand Barbarians' tour of England next month was put down by Phil Kingsley-Jones, his manager, yesterday. Press reports said that Lornu, the All Black wing, was so upset by his one-week suspension for a dangerous tackle that he had threatened to boycott the tour. but Kingsley-Jones denied it.

"That's rubbish," Kingsley-Jones said. "All we were afraid of was that he might be suspended for six weeks and he might not be able to go. There's never been any doubt about his availability."

Lomu was found guilty earlier this week by a rugby union judicial hearing of a "spear" tackle in a match last weekend. The suspension will prevent him from playing for the final of the national provincial championship against Auckland tomorrow. Derrick Patterson, the former Scotland scrum half, and Graham Ellis, the Scotland A hooker, have been added to the Scottish Rugby Union's list of contracted players, taking the total to 38. Patterson, who has recently joined Hawick, was in Scotland's World Cup squad in South Africa last year, where he played against Tonga, but he was overlooked for the tour to New Zealand this summer. Ellis, who is enjoying a suc-cessful season with Currie, rose to prominence last season as hooker in the Scotland A team and was selected for the tour to New Zealand.

Bath announced yesterday that they are changing their official dule from Bath Football his Counties-Manukau side in Club, which they have been since 1865, to Bath Rugby.

Wasps's best hopes now lie in

This was a competition we had targetted so it's been disappointing that we have not had a better record." Jeff Huckstep, the Wasps chief executive, said. But It has taken the players to a different level already and Toulouse, with all their internationals. will be a step higher again. You can talk all you want about divisional rugby, but this competition has given English rugby that extra di-mension it has been looking Bath's situation, while no as extreme as that of Wasps, is less assured than they would wish. Led by Jonathan Callard in the continued absence of the injured Phil de Glanville, the English champions must beat Dax at the Recreation Ground today. Jeremy Guscott and Henry Paul return in the centre after injury and Nathan Thomas is preferred to Andy Robinson in the back row.

But the most searching examinations will be of Leicester in Pau today, and Harlequins in Brive tomorrow. This is the essence of European competition, to perform well in unfamiliar territory; the two English clubs head pools B and C respectively, in the case of Leicester without winning too many prizes for style. Their captain, Dean Richards, is back at No 8 against the club who made no friends at all at Llanelli a week ago.

Harlequins appear to have concluded that Will Carling is not going to transform himself into a stand-off half. Paul Challinor plays there against Brive, with Carling in the centre, and the young New Zealander, Jamie Williams, on the wing ahead of Daren O'Leary. But success against the runners-up in last season's French Cup final may hinge on goal-kicking - Carling had barely enough shots in his locker to beat Ulster ten days ago - and, if Harlequins remain unbeaten tomorrow, a new force will really have come among us.

The whole art of sport depends on giving yourself an edge over the opposition. Mike Cito, a high-school

American football player for St Pius school in Albuquerque, certainly managed that. He turned out for a recent game with the buckle of his ness of a razor. This unusual ruse became apparent when his opponents kept leaving the field dripping with blood. One of them had to go to hospital for stitches. The director of St Pius Activities admitted that "the buckle was definitely milled". But, as the scandal erupts, the player's father has added a new twist. He says that he sharpened the buckle himself, and that his son knew nothing about it. How, then, did young Mike manage to remain innocent and undamaged while putting his heimet on?

The life of poor Diego has become a procession of the ever-more-ludicrous, which is ever-more-perilously balanced on the edge of the tragic. These days, he is a remote and traumatised figure living in Buenos Aires and playing football for nobody, with his former agent charged with drug-trafficking. The film includes clips of Diego's earliest footballing days, and its release also marks Diego's debut, at 15, for Argentinos Juniors. The film is about perpetual bondage

Parrott on cue for semi-final

By PHIL YATES

IN SOMETHING of a rarity at the Grand Prix in Bournemouth - a match that featured two easily recognisable players - John Parrott defeated James Wattana 5-3 yesterday to reach the semi-finals.

Although Perrott won the Asian Classic and European Open last season, he has not won a domestic event since the International Open in February 1994. The Liverpudlian is playing with such confidence, though, that his status as the bookmakers' favourite is fully justified.

Parrott is enjoying a revival with the replacement cue that he was obliged to employ when his old one went missing in the post last month. Confidently exploiting nearly every scoring chance afforded him, he always looked the more likely to advance.

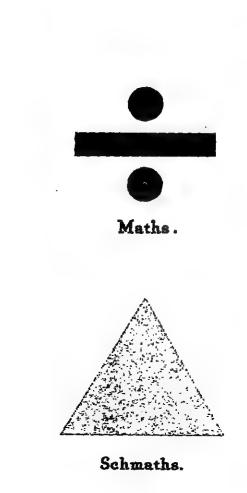

The 1991 world and United Kingdom champion would climb to fourteenth in the provisional rankings were he to prevail in the final tomorrow. To get there, he must overcome Mark Williams, the 21-year-old Welshman, who beat him 9-3 to win the Regal

Weish Open nine months ago. Parrott, assisted by breaks of 48 and 66 in the first frame, led 1-0 and 2-1, but Wattana, again showing encouraging signs that he is emerging from the most worrying spell of his career, levelled at 2-2 by the mid-session interval.

By controlling a scrappy fifth frame, Parrott regained the advantage, before dealing the Thai's hopes a severe blow in the next with a decisive 29 clearance to pink, which was initiated by a tricky penulti-mate red to a middle pocket and included a difficult green.

Parrott, who sealed victory with a run of 88 in the eighth frame, said that despite the nature of his defeat when he last met Williams, he was not unduly concerned. "Everyone knows that Mark is a great potter, but it was undoubtedly the worst snooker I have had the misfortune to produce in a final," he said.

Shortly after 3.40 this afternoon it could also be the most successful.

When the Earl De La Warr decided a year ago to gather a select team of owners to put six horses, costing an average of £50,000, into training with Luca Cumani, even he could not have dreamt of the out-before landing the Tattersalls Stakes at Newmarket earlier this month in a time fractionally outside the course record. His performances have already more than repaid his Ir 122,000 purchase price and attracted bids ten times that sum from prospective buyers.

The excitement within the syndicate was accentuated by the knowledge that it had an even better prospect at home. The Earl, his stepson, Alexander Hope, Lord Vestey, Gerald Leigh, Khaled Abdulla, Michael Kerr-Dineen, Sarah von Halle and Bob Goldhammer waited in anticipation for the appearance of Poteen on Arc

They were not disappointed as the $65,000 purchase lived up to his home reputation when winning a Haydock maiden in effortless style. Better was to follow. A week ago, the full brother to Bog Trotter produced an impressive piece of work on the Newmarket gallops which excited the normally reserved Cumani: so much so that he urged the owners to supplement Poteen for the Racing Post Trophy at Doncaster today at a cost of £15,000.

Although a strict reading of the form book confirms that Poteen must improve significantly to land the last group one event of the season, the confidence in the Cumani camp suggests he can improve on the effort of his stablemate, Mons, who was third in this race a year ago.

Benny The Dip, who had Besiege and Medaaly in third and fifth place respectively winning the Royal Lodge Stakes, is a solid fa-vourite especially as Desert Story, runner-up at Ascot, won the Horris Hill Stakes at Newbury on Thursday.

This race involves the continuing battle between Henry Cecil and Saeed bin Suroor for the trainers' championship. Besiege, a full-brother to Armiger, who won this race for Cecil in 1992, would appreciate easier ground and any overnight rain would increase his chances.

While Medaaly has the better form of Godolphin's two supplemented runners. Asas has scope for more improvement judged on the way he won a good Newmarket maiden 25 days ago. However, Cumani, a former assistant to Cecil, can upstage his old boss by winning with Poteen - and complete a remarkable season for his posh group of owners.

1.30: Rebel County has run 21 times this year for three different trainers but put up arguably her best perfor-mance when a close-up seventh to Hawksley Hill at Newmarket last Saturday. Her previous defeat of the useful Warming Trends at Haydock also reads well. Najm Mubcen returned from a year off because of iniury and won with plenty in hand when defeating Oops Pettic at Newmarket. He is open to considerable improvement.

However, preference is for Wilcuma who has progressed with every run this term. The Magnet Cup winner had been off for three months before running particularly well behind Proper Blue at Ascot two weeks ago and can go one better here.

2.00: Etna should appreciate this stiffer test of stamina and could go well at long odds. Fernanda has a form chance on her second to Sarayir at Newmarket three weeks ago but she does not appear to be the most trustworthy individual. Dragonada, stoutly bred on her step up to seven furlongs at Warwick last time and should relish today's trip and ground. However, I will side with Blane Water, who did particularly well to finish so close to Proud Native at Redcar nine days ago, given that the step back to six furlongs was not ideal.

2.30: Salmon Ladder. runner-up in a trio of group three races, is the form choice but is always vulnerable to a horse with finishing speed. Eva Luna, who may take on Paul Cole's game runner for the lead, disappointed in the Jockey Club Cup last time and will not be suited by the step back in distance.

able appeal at what should be value odds. The Old Vic colt produced his best effort when dead-heating with Ballynakelly here five weeks ago. He clearly likes this track and easy ground, having also won here a year ago.

3.10: Russian Revival is the clear form pick judged on his success at Newmarket but is unproven over seven furlongs and could be worth opposing. Ramooz beat the Godolphin runner in the Jersey Stakes and ran his best race behind Decorated Hero at Ascot last time. Hi Nod invariably runs well here and has claims if returning to top form.

3.40: see above. 4.15: Fairywings makes considerable appeal now that she tackles 12 miles for the first time. Given her breeding - she is out of a Dancing Brave mare — she should relish this longer trip. She travelled well in the Cambridgeshire last time when staving on to finish sixth.

looks a bigger danger. 4.45: Jhazi did well in the Redcar Two-Year-Old Trophy when drawn away from the pace and was not given a hard time once beaten. David Loder's speedy Arazi colt had previously broken the track record at Beverley and looks worth backing to regain the winning thread.

STRONG MEDICINE, trained by Kim Bailey, will return to Newbury next month for the Hennessy Gold Cup after winning the Kone Lifts Handicap Chase at the Berkshire track yesterday. Ridden by Conor O'Dwyer, Strong Medicine was left in second when Egypt Mill Prince was pulled up lame entering the home straight, and stayed on to beat Easthorpe by 12 lengths.

Bailey's assistant, Alex Hales, said: "He'll gu for the Hennessy now as we've been very pleased with his work at home in the past two weeks and he's shown he stays three miles. Conor said he was pleased with the horse as apart from jumping to the right once he did absolutely nothing wrong."

RACING: PAST BREEDERS' CUP FAILURES SAP CONFIDENCE IN MILE FAVOURITE

Ghosts of history stalk Mark Of Esteem

ROM JULIAN MUSCAT

IT WAS a throwaway line from Frankie Denori neatly summarised the chances of Mark Of Esteem in the Breeders' Cup Mile here today. Within a positive assessment of Europe's champi-on miler-elect. Dettori guardedly added: "Everything looks right about the horse but we won't know how well he has taken the journey until after the race." That detail is worth remembering. In the last decade, Shadeed, Milligram, Warning. Zilzal. Markoldistinction and Bigstone all travelled to the Breeders' Cup on the back of cuphoric victories in the Queen Elizabeth II Stakes. All were roused, yet on every Breeders' Cup eve, the Americans were promised it would be different this time. The track is generous, the climate favourable and Mark

Of Esteem was devastating when winning at Ascor. The bay has had a light season. will have his favoured surface and should outclass inferior opposition. If only it were that simple. "Every year we take our best horses but our record is not too great." Dentori noted.

Ordinarily, such negative pointers might be worth over-looking in the belief that Mark Of Esteem's class will pull him through. But not at his skimpy odds. Taking even money about the colt is about as attractive as betting on Lord Lucan reappearing aboard Shergar. Much though the heari beats for Mark Of Esteem, the head dictates that Memories Of Silver, unbeaten in four outings on turk is an each-way steel at 9-1 with Ladbrokes.

The rise of Memories Of Silver has been meteoric. She won her maiden immediately she was switched to turl. dismissed a grade three field by six lengths two months ater and outran Shake The Yoke in record time at Keeneland three weeks ago.

Spinning World, the French challenger, has looked outstanding since arriving here. He would have been the selection had the rains persisted; the track was riding good to soft yesterday and dry weather is forecast. The Breeders' Cup Turf offers the European challenge its best shot. Local judges maintain the home contingent is weak, and one telling statistic endorses that view, Diplomatic Jet, the shortest-priced American runner, has posted a solitary victory in 22 starts away from his beloved Belmont Park. Singspiel undertakes the Tikkanen, who both prevailed local odds than at home in the Turf after preparing in North America. Singspiel's Canadian International vic-Swain and Pilsudski could tory over this course and distance three weeks ago was emphatic, but he has never appealed in top-class company over 12 furlongs. His stable-mate, Pilsudski, comes here after reaching the frame in Paris. The prespect of Dushvantor mastering this field in Europe would be remote yet the Sadler's Wells colt has been a bastion of health since reaching Woodbine. Remarkably, his courage has been questioned, an utterly disgraceful label given his recovery from a

Splendid though Iktamal appears, his prospects in the Sprint have been lessened by his position in stall four. The race will surely be over by the time he gets accustomed to the kickback. In an open race, Lit De Justice may spring a mild At his best, Tamayaz could

Two defeats in his last three starts suggest Cigar is vulnerable, the strains of racing over four seasons evidently taking their toll. Cannock captain under investigation

SPORT IN BRIEF

MIDLAND COUNTIES hockey management committee is investigating a complaint against the Cannock captain.
Kalbir Takher (Sydney Friskin writes. The England and Great Britain centre half is alleged to have verbally abused the umpire, Hamish Jamson, after Cannock had lost 4-3 to East Grinstead in the Premier division this month.

Old Loughtonians face two tough Premier division matches this weekend, against Teddington today and Guildford tomorrow. Julian Halls has returned to Old Loughtonians after completing his coaching duties in Guernsey, but may not play because of an injury. If Teddington survive this match, however, and get past Reading tomorrow, they will see themselves as title contenders. Southgate have parted company with Robert Freeman, who has been key to their attack, but Nigel D'Cruz has rejoined them and is in the squad for both weekend matches, against Hounslow and Barford Tigers.

CRICKET: South Africa beat Australia by two wickets in Faridabad, India, yesterday to reach the final of the Titan Cup, largely through the efforts of Allan Donald and Daryll Cullinan, Donald's four wickets in eight balls saw Australia decline from 2/2 for five to 2/5 all out. Then Cullinan followed his 106 against India with a gritty, unbeaten 71 as South Africa got home with two overs to spare.

Tough test for Neary

BOXING: Shea Neary, the light-weiterweight from Liverpool, meets the experienced American. Darryl Tyson, at Everton Park Leisure Centre tonight. Neary, noted for his punching power, has disposed of 14 of his 16 opponents inside the distance. Tyson, 36, has lost nine of 57 contests but has met some top names. Last February, he was knocked out by the outstanding Oscar De La Hoya.

Tomba misses opener

SKIING: Urs Kaelin, of Switzerland, and Lasse Kjus, of Norway, will lead the challengers to Michael von Grüningen, of Switzerland, when he begins the defence of his World Cup giant slalom championship at Sölden, in Austria, tomorrow. However, the great Italian, Alberto Tomba, will not take part after badly bruising his left knee and right wrist in a heavy fall during training.

THE TIMES GUIDE TO THE PREMIERSHIP THIS WEEKEND

ARSENAL

George Graham makes a piquant return to Highbury. where, for all his recent misadlove him. But in Leeds United he has taken ventures, most of the fans still over a team in desperate straits. Faint hope lies in the fact that Arsenal just now seem to find it difficult to beat anybody. Platt has still to find form and even the return of the virtuoso Dennis Bergkamp has not yet got things to flow. That Arsenal stand so high says more about the Premiership than it does about them.

DERBY COUNTY

Post-Bosman, faxes and video tapes of foreign players are arriving on managers' desks on a daily basis and Jim Smith is taking more interest than most. His need to sign a striker is paramount. "But it is hard to find the right person at a good price," he said. Dean Sturridge, joint leading scorer with two, misses tomorrow's game against Liverpool through ankle trouble and Smith must be rueing the decision to loan one of his forwards. Marco Gabbiadini, to Birmingham City. RH chief at the ready and sat with his head in his hands. "He was hamming it up really well," Gregory said. "I think."

EVERTON Most managers complain that they have to play too much football. Recently Joe Royle has been complaining his team are not playing enough, with the October international break, the derby postponement last weekend and another international break coming up. "It's too long," Royle complained. "It's broken up the flow — you saw against West Ham that our play was very fragmentary." It has, though, given

sigent. Instead he has endured an endless list of injuries at Hillsborough, and now he is experiencing the worst goal drought of his career. It surely will not be long before David Pleat looks to the promise of Richie

BLACKBURN ROVERS

Ray Harford said that things would get better for his successor, because he would have Le Saux, Hendry and Sutton back. Harford thought he would be going next week, however, and Tony Parkes, the caretaker manager, does not have such luxuries for the visit to Upton Park. He joined the team coach to London for what was a subdued journey. The players reacted with some shock at the news yesterday - it seems that they were just about the only people who did not know.

The return of George Graham and David O'Leary to Highbury today serves only to tell them the task they face at Elland Road. "When George came to Highbury, the club needed turning round," O'Leary said, "but he is facing a monumental task at Leeds. It is a much bigger job, there is a lot wrong here, and if he turns this round, it will be a phenomenal achievement. The squad is not good enough." Graham concurs. A long, hard season lies ahead.

CHELSEA

The game against Tottenham has been overshadowed by the death of Matthew Harding. If the Chelsea players, who liked him so much, are effectively in a state of mourning, who could blame them? And if the Tottenham men. too. are affected by the occasion, what could be more natural? It is evident that in recent weeks, things have gone badly wrong for Chelsea. Perhaps the belated return of Ruud Gullit will at last turn the tide. But it would be unfair to expect too much today.

LEICESTER CITY

With Newcastle visiting Filbert Street this afternoon, Martin O'Neill, the Leicester manager. could be forgiven for concentrating fully on how to stop a side with the talent to overcome the loss of Alan Shearer. Instead he is demanding more goals from his own team and not just through the strikers. Leicester have yet to score from midfield in the Premiership and O'Neill said: "Quality teams have a midfielder in double figures. At this rate our three will not get 10 between them."

COVENTRY CITY

Ron Atkinson's attempt to huy success - or, perhaps, survivar - at Highfield Road continues to flounder, 20 months and £18 million into the job. Yet Bryan Richardson, the club chairman, has promised further funds should Big Ron's policy of spend, spend, spend prove fruitless, "We are under no financial pressures and if we have to invest more money in the team, then there is no problem." Richardson said. The apparently bottomless pit of readies must be exhausted soon, surely.

Robbie Fowler has the chance tomorrow to show that he is the man to fill the large hole for England created by the injury to Shearer. "I am ready for England, I feel as though I am up to the job." Fowler said. Roy Evans feels so, too, "Robbie has had a difficult season with injury, but he is over that, and I think he is the natural replacement for Shearer." he said. Evans will field the side selected to play against Everton last Sunday, which means no place for Collymore.

MANCHESTER UNITED

Ryan Giggs's calf injury is beginning to worry United. Apart from a brief appearance against Liverpool as substitute. he has not played for United this month. He misses the game today at Southampton and is already looking doubtful for the Champions' League match against Fenerbahce on Wednesday. His absence may be the opportunity for Ben Thornley, who had a good game against Swindon, after two years out with a cruciate ligament injury and a long slow recovery.

MIDDLESBROUGH

With Bryan Robson, the manager, refusing to discuss the future of Nick Barmby, Mikkel Beck seems certain to take the England player's attacking place against Wimbledon today. Fabrizio Ravanelli ben-efited from Beck's aerial prowess during the midweek Coca-Cola Cup demolition of Huddersfield but it will be harder today. Middlesbrough have conceded 11 goals in just four games: no wonder that the hapless Alan Miller is replaced by Gary Walsh in goal. Walsh in goal.

NEWCASTLE UNITED

With Shearer out injured for a month, there is abvious despondency on Tyneside. Consolation may come in the form of Faustino Asprilla, Asprilla has never been played in the position he likes best, behind a centre forward, and it will be entertaining, if nothing else, to watch him attempting to forge a partnership with Les Ferdinand. Newcastle are going for their eighth consecutive Premiership win, and that even before Mark Lawrenson, the new defensive coach, comes aboard - who needs him! DM

Seven days ago, Frank Clark. the manager, conceded that outsiders might think the club was in crisis, but reassured them that was not the case. Following the Coca-Cola Cup defeat to West Ham on Wednesday, his opinion shifted. There is no doubt we are in crisis," Clark admitted. There is so much to put right and I do not know where to start. Try the treatment room. He desperately needs Stuart Pearce to recover from a back problem for the game on Monday against Everton.

SOUTHAMPTON As Southampton aim to repeat

the victory of last season over that team who used to play in grey, the recent return from injury of Jason Dodd, an old hand in a new role, has been as encouraging as the form of the new signings. "I see him as a key man, because he can play in so many positions," Graeme Souness said of the former full back. "I like to use him in midfield. He is aggressive, he can pass the ball, he can get about the park." Remind you of NS anybody?

TOTTENHAM HOTSPUR

Slaven Bilic, the Croatia and West Ham defender, now has an inflated wage packet to match his ego, after successful pay negotiations with his Upton Park masters. He will not be joining Tottenham. as was once widely mooted. "I never wanted to go to Spurs," he said this week. "Sure. they are a big team but, with respect to them, I would only leave West Ham to join a big, big club. They re just not big enough for the to give up all the nappiness i in enjoying here." Ouch.

WEST HAM UNITED

Hugo Portirio might have been playing at Upton Park today — for Blackburn. The fleet-footed Portuguese, who has made such a striking impression, had a trial at Ewood Park last season, but quickly cut it short and was then highly critical of Rovers' inflexible, direct style. Ray Harford may have gone, but the style remains. Porfirio should lead West Ham to their third home win in a week. "He is a special talent," Harry Redknapp, the manager, said. A

Issue of safety at grounds cannot become a lottery

FOR the second Saturday running spectators in lootball stadiums are being asked to observe a minute's silence. Today it is as a mark of respect for Matthew Harding, killed in a helicopter crash while indulging his passion for Chelsea. A week ago it was for 84 Guatemalans sufficiated to death in a sickening replay of the Hillsborough terracing tragedy of 1989 - the same circumstances of overcrowding, panic, and those damned fences preventing escape. Look around you. You will se no fences in Great Britain inday. Look at the top level, and there are new cantilever stands replacing or refurbishing old ones. There are seven new stadiums, nine more in the building stage.

Now, consider this: that because of the effect of the National Lottery, which is about to double, the funds available to put a safe roof over the heads of the remaining stands in professional football are 50 per cent down,

It is half-time in the Taylor report stipulation on modernising and making sale football grounds. The Premier League and first division have had the bulk of the money so far, but if the Government insists on the Taylor timetable - that the lower divisions must comply by the end of the decade — and the drip-feed of money available from the Football Trust continues to dry up, then consequence will be closure of grounds, and diminution of the structure of 92 professional clubs in England, and more in Scotland and

There is no crying wolf. The danger is very real that football, having followed the Taylor recommendations to rebuild from the top down, could now starve the clubs that need money to survive.

One does not argue with the priority: the greatest threat to public safety was indisputably in old Victorian grounds at the top of the league, which periodically threatened to claim the lives of paying customers. But the link between Harding, football fan grown into insurince multimillionaire, and this dire problem of funding, is writ large. Harding's reported wealth was very close to the £139 million that the Football Trust has contributed so far to £437 million already expended on bringing grounds to safe allseater levels under Taylor. However, the unequal distribution of wealth in society. never mind the national game. has always been with us. It merely seems anomalous in this situation that Harding. together with Jack Walker, the Blackburn Rovers benefactor, could have paid for the regeneration programme between them.

It was a misleading signal. So is the multimillion-pound turnover at clubs like Manchester United, Newcastle United and Liverpool. And clubs hardly help themselves at any level in the Gillingham this week got themselves into trouble with the police by allegedly over-crowding their little stadium for the visit of Coventry City. Southampton annoyed visitors from Lincoln City by failing to anticipate a full house. Middlesbrough have just released Branco, the Brazilian defender who started just six matches, but who arrived overweight and under-motivated, and still will have cost the club £750,000 in paid-up salary. The same club is trying to sell Nick Barmby, and doubtless will lose a couple of million pounds on that mistake as well.

These constant reports of money, the flock of leading clubs towards the Stock Exchange, make the plea of Lord Aberdare, the chairman of the Football Trust, evermore a cry in the wilderness.

His trustees include the Football League and the Pro-fessional Footballers' Association, the parties which have just ended an acrimonious hartle for the spoils of the TV poi. Yet Lord Aberdare, announcing that Football Trust income has slipped towards half the £37 million it was before the National Lonery, is trying to persuade the Gov-ernment either to further decrease its tax on the pools money, which accounts for £8 of every £10 the Trust receives, or to extend the deadline by which lower and impoverished clubs can rebuild their amenities.

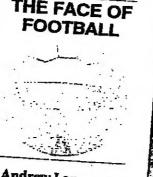

Those working for the Trust are in constant touch with the game and the Government. We hope that football, with its new wealth, will play its full part, Lord Aberdare said. While hope is eternal, the deadline is not. And while Sunderland, preparing to move next season to a £12 million stadium at Wearmouth, are assured of a £2.5 million grant, not only are the prospects for the second and third division clubs diminishing, but the Football Trust commitment to grass-roots football and to community schemes has also dried up. Without some Government action, or some benevolence from the wealthy within the game, the bottom will fall out of professional football. There remains one area of positive discrimination. The Trust has so far contributed 5669,000 to granting women a level playing field — and, whereas Trust aid towards the provision of men's toilets is 70 per cent, for women and disabled the Trust pledges 85 per cent. For once in the game, it is What gave some additional credence to the doom-mongers was the sound of strife behind the net curtains. Dean Holdsworth wanted to take his modelling career somewhere else. A team of wealthy merchants just ripe for the highwayman. You can work it out from there, and from Kinnear's suspicion of overpriced foreign imports.

"If I was given £5 million to spend, I'd have to look at the overall picture and ask myself: 'What's this superstar really going to do for me? Will all our lads respond to him or is he just going to be another fat cat? I'd have no bother buying Shearer for £15 mil-

"He told me not to be overawed by the big names around me and that gave me self-belief." Kinnear said. "He also taught me to have pride in my performance. He'd say: There are 40,000 people out there. Each one would give their right arm to wear the shirt you're wearing, now go out and show it to them." Hard if, as is so often the case at Selhurst Park, the crowd numbers barely five

Gravesend look for cup of cheer

GRAVESEND and Northfleet launched this season on a wave of optimism after their sails had been filled by the FA Cup run that mok them to Villa Park in January (Walter Gammie writes). Yet they return to Cup action today, against Stevenage Borough in the fourth qualifying round, listing badly at the bottom of the Dr Martens League premier division. Lionel Ball, the chairman, said: "We are all shattered. We were expecting great things. It shows how things can go wrong in this game. Some of the players are not performing up to the expected standards.

The inevitable casualty of the club's start to the season was Chris Weller, the "Iguana Man", whose reptile collection excited as much attention as the team he took to play at Aston Villa, where Gravesend lost 3-0 in front of 26,000 in the third round last season.

Veller's successor was a piayer-manager, Steve Lovell, 36, the former Wales forward. Stevenage, the Vauxhall Conference champions. The winners will be out of the showers quickly to take in the firstround draw, which is on BBC1 at 5.10pm.

Still no room for Rush as Gould recalls Jones

ladies first

By Russell Kempson

VINNIE JONES, the Wimbledon midfield player, has been recalled by Wales for their World Cup qualifying match against Holland in Eindhoven on November 9. However, Ian Rush, the Leeds United striker, has again been ignored by Bobby Gould, the manager.

Wales need at least a draw wates need at least a draw in Holland to resurrect their chances of winning group seven, which they lead by virtue of two easy victories against San Marino. Though they led 1-0 against the Dutch in Cardiff three weeks ago, they eventually lost 3-1. they eventually lost 3-1,

Gould feels the need for more combative qualities in Eindhoven with Jones, 31. who made the last of his five international appearances against Switzerland in April, guaranteed to provide the extra edge. "We're going into a cauldron and we'll need all the experienced players we can muster," Gould said, "Vinnie is a competitor and, when a player is playing well in a team that's also playing well, you have to look at him."

Rush, yet to score for Leeds this season, has been over-looked by Gould, with John Hartson, of Arsenal, likely to replace Mark Hughes, who is suspended, in the Wales attack. Hartson, who has won live senior caps, has scored ten goals in seven under-21 matches. "John is champing at the bit and it's difficult to hold him back," Gould said.

Mark Crossley, the Nottingham Forest goalkeeper, who was born in Barnsley, has been placed on standby after confirming his eligibility. His late grandfather was Welsh, from Wrexham. Ryan Giggs returns to the squad after a one-match suspension, which forced him to miss the defeat in Cardiff.

SHINTY: KINGUSSIE LAMENT LACK OF REAL CHALLENGE TO THEIR SUPREMACY

Newtownmore hoping to bounce back By COLL MACDOUGALL

WHILE Kingussie, runaway leaders in the Marine Harvest Premier League, can look forward to an easy contest this weekend, at Drumneerochit against Glenurquart, who are finding it difficult to meet the standards required at this level, a much closer encounter can be anticipated at Eilan, where Newtownmore clash with Fort William. These two pretenders for Kingussie's title have both lost to them. Newtownmore suffering a double-figure drubbing last week, which left them four points adrift, with Fort William a further point behind.

Newtownmore did shock their old adversaries by going two goals up in nine minutes, they faded badly thereafter. The ease with which Ronald Ross knocked in seven goals and Kevin Thain another three is indicative of the gap between Kingussie and the rest of the teams in the

ian Ross, the Kingussie manager, said this week that he was disappointed at the failure of other sides to provide real competition. "When the league was created," he said, "it was stated forcefully that all eight teams would be of a similar standard and that one-sided matches would be a thing of the past. This has not happened and I blame those who are not putting enough effort into building their teams and seeing they are fit and trained to the highest level in the basic skills."

While Ross is fortunate he has so many battle-hardened players, David Cheyne, his Newtownmore counterpart, has a young side with only three experienced players in it. While Newtownmore have had an encouraging run, very often at the expense of those 100 complacent to contemplate defeat by what have been called "a bunch of rookies", the rout by Kingussie was a pointed reminder that success can be gained only through a balanced combination of youth and experience. Fort William have such a balance but have acquired the unfortu-nate habit of losing to teams that they should beat easily.

Inverary, who snatched their second victory of the season by the narrowest of margins over Glasgow Mid Argyll, the bottom club, face a much more formidable challenge against Kyles Athletic. David McPherson has had to rebuild his Inverary side and they may struggle to cope with Kyles, whose poor performance against Oban Camanachd will have brought them up with a jolt.

Harford bows to inevitable at Blackburn

By PETER BALL

EIGHTEEN months ago, Ray Harford embarked on a mission to build on the championship success of the Blackburn Rovers side he inherited from Kenny Dalglish. It proved to be mission impossible. Yesterday he resigned from the manager's post at Ewood Park with the club bottom of the FA Carling Premiership and out of the Coca-Cola Cup.

"It's important the club comes out of the situation it is in and maybe a change will help," Harford said at a press conference at the club's Brockhall training ground yesterday morning. I could have stayed, Jack Walker wanted me to stay, but I didn't think it was doing the club any good. The decision had to be taken and, hopefully, it is the right decision for everybody."

The move had been on the cards for some time. Blackburn are the only team in England without a league win and defeat on Tuesday eve-ning by Stockport County, of the Nationwide League second division, in the third round of the Coca-Cola Cup made it inevitable. "I've spent a lot of time thinking about it since the Stockport game." Harford said. That game finally clinched it - the result and performance was the last

It may also be hard for the club to find a manager of the stature of Dalglish, but that is clearly what is needed to stabilise Blackburn if they are to regain their status - albeit brief - among the country's big clubs. Howard Kendall, presently at Sheffield United, will be the favourite to get the job, with Terry Venables, Bruce Rioch and, perhaps, Howard Wilkinson also coming under consideration. Rob Coar, the club chairman, ruled out any suggestion of an appeal to Dalglish to return. Whatever his difficulties,

Kinnear's aim .. Jones recalled

Harford has always conduct-

integrity and he handled his departure with typical honesty. "I take the responsibility for the club's position, but I don't take a lot of the blame." he reflected. "There were not many things I'd have done differently this year, last year, there were a few things I should have done."

Harford was a big influence as coach as Dalglish, supported by the ambition and money of the club's benefactor, Walker, took the club into the Premiership and to the championship in the space of four seasons. He may feel that his biggest mistake was deciding to stay on as manager after Dalglish relinquished the

Graham says he will walk the corridors with his head held high. He also anticipates a warm welcome from the Arsenal supporters.

"I'll get a great reception. I think what was achieved there and the honours we won will ensure a tremendous re-sponse, both from the terraces and from the employees," he said. "I had a wonderful career, both as a manager and a player at Highbury, so why should it be any other way? Wimbledon, too, have recorded seven straight wins and are looking to extend that sequence at Middlesbrough. Wimbledon, who have reached the heady heights of third in the table, welcome back Efan Ekoku, Neil Ardley and Ben Thatcher.

Robson demands £6m for unsettled Barmby By DAVID MADDOCK and the interest from Ewood Park will be

NICK BARMBY, the England international, has been put up for sale by Middlesbrough just 14 months after Bryan Robson, the manager, spent a then club record £5.25 million to move him north from Tottenham Hotspur.

Robson, however, has so far rejected a E5 million offer from Everton for the forward, claiming that he is worth more now than the price originally paid for him. Blackburn Rovers and Leeds United are also interested in the player.

Barmby has become increasingly unhappy at Middlesbrough and Robson explained that he has taken the decision to sell such a talented young player simply because his partnership with Juninho, the Brazilian, has not gelled. "I thought I could play the two behind a main striker, but it has just not worked out," Robson said. "We have been overpowered on too many occasions this season because of it. I think Barmby has a big future, and he is a top player, but I think it is best he moves."

Robson was keen to stress, though, that he will not let the player go for less than the valuation he has made of around £6 million. "If I get an offer at the right price that will further his career, then I will consider it carefully," he said. Everton have been keen on the forward
